variations of the old themes. He might have said all he had to say upon music, once for all, long before he was forty, had he been capable at that time of the necessary compression both in his thinking and his writing. What makes the latest prose works so admirable is the general swiftness of their thought and the concision and directness of the expression: essays like those 'On Operatic Poetry and Composition,' and 'On the Application of Music to the Drama,' are things to read again and again. But at the end of the 'forties his mind was, as he afterwards said, 'an impassioned tangle of ideas.' The unwieldy 'Opera and Drama' is a desperate attempt not so much to instruct the public as to come to consciousness of himself: he cut his way in the end through that monstrous jungle, and ever afterwards had nothing to do but follow his star. The purgation that work had effected in him, and the general gain of clarity in his later writings, may be seen by comparing the 'Reminiscences of Auber' (1871) with the passage on 'Masaniello' in 'Opera and Drama' (1851). There is still a little of the typical Wagnerian fudge about 'the French nature'—a thing he all his life remained as constitutionally incapable of understanding or appreciating as a cat is incapable of understanding a dog—but on the whole the latter essay is free from the mists, the sham generalisations, the self-deluding verbiage of the earlier work. In his last years he could be as wordy and as foggy as ever when he was setting the world right on some metaphysical or political or ethnological question on which he had no particular authority to be speaking at all: but he was lucidity itself in his discussions of music.

His prose works, then, are merely, as it were, a series of beads of irregular form and varying value strung upon the one unchanging personality. There were two fundamental strains in him, the artist and the social revolutionist—though the latter, strictly speaking, is only a branch of the former. He sighed for a new social and political world only because in no other kind of world could art exist as he desired it to be. And as an artist he wanted the whole world to go his way. As he was largely insensitive to the qualities in painting, sculpture, and poetry that endear them to painters, sculptors and poets, he calmly demanded that all these should give up their joy in their own work and devote themselves simply to co-operating in his art of music-drama. In later years he recognised that the political visions of his early manhood had been unrealisable, but he was as intolerant as ever of the other arts so far as they did not fit in with his own purposes; even in 1879 he was capable of saying, for example, that all Greek genius was nothing but 'an artistic re-editing of Homer,' and of seeing nothing in rhyme but a more or less mechanical jingle.

He was wholly absorbed in music-drama: that was the one channel through which the life-force in him could find an adequate outlet; and as the greatest need of his soul as an artist was logic, coherence, consistency, the problem that racked him was how to build up a musical drama that should be profoundly human in quality and thoroughly organic in tissue. It is extremely interesting to watch this ideal coming to realization both in his stage creations and in his prose works. It is in pursuit of this vision that he ranges, in the tortuous pages of 'Opera and Drama,' through the heavens above and the earth beneath and the waters under the earth. Rid the huge book of all its superfluous matter and we arrive at last at the simple propositions that music-drama is a union of drama and music, that each must take something from and give something to the other, that the drama must be worthy and capable of moving us, and that the music must be a living organism, not an arbitrary collection of badly-jointed limbs with no flow of blood between them. It is this that the artist in him was driving him on to create, and it used the thinker in him merely for its own purposes of clarification. The 'Communication to my Friends' is simply a long and passionate statement of this need for an organic substance and form in music-drama, and the means by which he thought he had attained it. He is throughout unconscious that it was the musician in him that was guiding and controlling every other factor of his being. We can see clearly enough now that it was so. With a very slight change in his original make-up he would have been a composer of the stamp of Beethoven, content to work within the limits of a purely orchestral form. But his musical sense had a more definite poetic turn than Beethoven's, and he needed a definite poetic basis upon which to weave his symphonies of voice and orchestra. Music meant little or nothing to him unless it spoke directly of humanity and to humanity. No theme must be invented for mere invention's sake, or worked out for the mere sake of working-out: it must spring into being as the expression of an overwhelming human need or of some blinding vision, and must answer in all its changes to the changing life of the man or mood it painted. It was this inevitableness of idea and of form that he admired in Beethoven and missed in Brahms. It was his inability to compromise on the matter that made him contemptuously sweep out of existence most of the music of his day. It was precisely in this broadening of the Beethovenian spirit and design, and the making of them instruments capable of expressing every emotion that mankind can feel, that he opened out such enormous possibilities to music. It can hardly be said that a tenth of these new possibilities have been realised since his death. The formalist, the academic, the conservatoire are still with us,—all the crowd of little timid souls who see nothing but ruin off their own safe sheep-tracks; and even the bigger men have not built upon Wagner anything so vast and so enduring as the edifice he erected on the work of Beethoven. But for neither failure is he to blame: it simply means that after all these years of familiarity with his music and his theories, the world at large has not even yet assimilated the essence of his teaching. And so it is as well for us to go again and again to the prose works in which he revealed his vision of a music human and sincere in every fibre of its being, and growing from bar to bar with the infallible consistency and coherence of a tree, the root implying the smallest branches and the leaves, these in turn implying the root. The sensible thing would be to burn nine-tenths of the text-books on 'form' that are at present forced into the hands of students, and to set them to master these writings of Wagner upon form,—so penetrating in their insight, so drastic in their expression, so uncompromising in their idealism. We shall have to go beyond even his sense of form some day, but that will not be until we have caught up with it.

THE PROBLEM OF DISCORD.

By M.-D. CALVOCRESSI.

Among the problems alluded to at the close of the article on 'The perplexities of the modern music-lover' (Musical Times, March, 1913), none is more irritating, perhaps, than the one resulting from the fact that in new works we frequently meet with combinations that we cannot help finding unsatisfactory—even offensive: that upset all our notions of musical beauty, or at least make us feel that the composer is at cross-purposes with our taste and with the standing order.

Slight as that problem may appear—especially when we remember how soon men learn thoroughly to enjoy things that they had begun by feeling themselves quite unable to tolerate, and how we admire in classical masterpieces many a passage that had been in its time condemned as cacophonous—it deserves not to be overlooked; for it touches, as I will now attempt to show, several more general problems, which an investigation of it can but help to solve.

What is 'discord'? According to Grove's Dictionary (article by Sir Hubert Parry), 'A combination of notes which produces a certain restless craving in the mind for some further combination upon which it can rest with satisfaction. The changed combination which must follow discords in order to relieve the sense of pain they produce, is called the resolution.'

According to Dr. Hugo Riemann ('Handbuch der Harmonielehre' and passim), 'discord results from the disturbance, through foreign elements, of a chord's unity of meaning. Chords that have the outward appearance of consonant major or minor triads may nevertheless be dissonant: for the notion of consonance is neither physical nor physiological, but psychological.'

We need not for our present ends take into account Dr. Riemann's definition, which remains abstract and merely technical, whereas Sir Hubert Parry's is concrete and comprehensive enough to suit our purpose. The first question, then, is—How and why do composers use discord?

We may, without further ado, leave aside the usual case, common to classical music and to modern, of its uses as a counterfoil, a transition, or for a definite expressive purpose. What concerns us is the fact that in modern music discords, in greater quantity, and new, 'harsher' discords, are ever appearing; that they are no longer atoned for by palliative, grateful resolutions, but are set forth as grateful in themselves.

Having made that remark, the wise will, if they have not reached it yet, forthwith come to the conclusion that if we are to enjoy modern art at all, we must begin by admitting that no habit and no art-rule, be it as time-honoured as that of 'resolution,' is imprescriptible; and even if the investigation of the problem of discord led to no other result, the time spent on it would be repaid.

In his admirable paper on 'The meaning of ugliness in art' (London Congress, 1911), Sir Hubert Parry remarks that 'every advance in art has been made by accepting something which has been condemned as ugly by recognised artistic authorities. It is not so very long ago that such simple things as major thirds and major sixths were regarded as unpleasant,' and that often 'the feeling of ugliness which people think they suffer from is merely the result of not understanding.' In other words the distinction between an æsthetically painful feeling and an æsthetically pleasant feeling is wholly arbitrary. It would have been futile to try to convince those who found major thirds or sixths unpleasant that they were wrong: but nevertheless the combinations have proved themselves pleasant in the long run, and it would be no less futile to try to affirm their unpleasantness.

Berlioz found intolerably harsh discords in Wagner's 'Tristan'; and a score of the work is preserved that bears in contemptuous and angry pencil annotations many a proof of his sincerity. Reams of paper are nowadays blackened in attempts to decide whether M. Debussy's favourite harmonies are beautiful or unbearable. And it would take time to discover three score music-lovers prepared to declare that M. Arnold Schönberg's discords are not extremely painful. Let us waste no time in trying to ascertain if in the latter two cases the matter will eventually be settled as it is in the first: the many questions pertaining to the problem of discord that come to the mind of the practical æsthetician do not include horoscopes.

The æsthetic appeal of discord when used for a definite dramatic purpose (the beginning of the final section of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the climax of the Venusberg section in the 'Tannhäuser' overture, the first part of Liszt's 'Dante' Symphony afford striking and familiar cases in point) calls for no comment. Let us notice, however, that when writing dramatic music or a tone-poem—and, more generally speaking, when intent on expressing intense and definite feelings of a painful kind—a composer is led to use, to invent more daring discord than any belonging to the usual idiom of 'pure' music of the same period. The remark is of no special use to us at present, except for showing that our subject leads up to the very core of the problem of programme music, one of the heaviest and most vital of musical æsthetics (and one that would have been suppressed had not creative artists obstinately forced it upon wranglers).

It is not always with a view to immediate expression of feeling that writers of programme music use discords, but often as abstract, conventional symbols; and comparison will show that it is the very harshest discords that are used thus. Kuhnau, the first to contrive a systematical theory of programme music, gives in his Bible Sonatas several striking instances: inter alia, when he expresses Gideon's doubts by 'entries in seconds, after the fashion of timorous singers endeavouring to hit the right note.'

In such cases the purpose of discord is not æsthetical. Discord is not the symbol of an emotional state, but comes in as a means of supplying the intellect with a symbol on which it works; or, as Kuhnau words it, of directing it towards a third term (dass man auf eine Analogiem ziele—here, the wavering of ‘timorous singers’).

The distinction between music 'of feeling' and music 'of mind,' to which this remark naturally leads, will be found essential to the study of programme music. Even in modern times, the methods explained and put into practice by Kuhnau will be found to obtain; for instance, it is impossible to account for many of the most appalling discords occurring in the music of Dr. Richard Strauss, except if one considers them as pointing towards a 'third term': the final chords in 'Zarathustra' may fail to please from the musical point of view; but if, as we are told, they stand for an 'unsolved riddle,' there is no doubt, they are surpassingly graphic. Kuhnau, long before, had likewise translated Jacob's wiles into 'deceptive cadences,' which can but have appeared strikingly suggestive until the time when their 'deceptiveness' ceased to make itself felt.

Imitative or descriptive purposes may lead a composer to hardly less unusual effects :

(RAVEL: 'La Vallée des Cloches,'— Paris, Demets.)

In this example, selected at random from the many that might be adduced, we have to deal not with abstract, conventional symbolism founded on some allusion to a third term, nor even with an attempt to express in poignant manner some violent or painful emotion, but with representation in the concrete: the composer has found the combination fit, not accidentally and despite its intrinsic ugliness, but in itself. His obvious intention is to reproduce, for its beauty, the tone of the bells, to excite a feeling of pleasure similar to the one derived from chimes in the distance.

Now—and the remark, again, will be of service for the study of the problem of programme music—the greater number of combinations created for special dramatic, descriptive, or symbolic purposes pass into the sphere of independent abstract music. We may or may not condemn them, when met with in programme music, on the plea that they are devoid of æsthetical purpose; but it is as music pure and simple that the discords unsparingly used in non-programmatical works say by MM. Debussy, Ravel, Bartok, Cyril Scott, and Arnold Schönberg must stand or fall.

When a composer uses as final chord a seventh or a second instead of the customary tonic ; when he graces with one or several adjunct notes what his predecessors would have left as plain triads, and so forth, there is no ambiguity in his purpose : he aims no more at producing a sensation of pain than the first did who freely used as consonances major thirds and sixths.

A noteworthy fact is that, with the possible exception of M. Scriabin—and leaving aside the, in my opinion, still dubious case of M. Schönberg and his school—the object of composers who thrust before us the most unexpected discords is not music of mind, but music of feeling. I mean that artists like MM. Debussy, Bartok, or Kodaly, write music that aims at being physically pleasurable, proceeds from and is intended for the ear and not the brain—that is ‘concrete’ and not ‘abstract’ in its purpose.

The discords used by them seem to have been evolved from a merely intuitive process, and selected not only for their fitness from the expressive point of view, but also for their intrinsic beauty.

Madness, no doubt, it may be, or appear to be. In that madness however there is, besides a set purpose, a method: it will be found in practice that an accidentally struck false note disturbs the balance of a sequence of 'discords' written by an artist as deeply as it would that of the sweetest consonances.

I am speaking of the composer's purpose. It is self-evident that unless the student of modern music is led by his own feeling to agree in opinion with the composers, no saving clause can be found.

In what is classical in art, says Walter Pater, to the absolute beauty of artistic form is added the accidental tranquil charm of familiarity. There are times, indeed, at which these charms fail to work on our spirits at all because they fail to excite us.'

(BARTOK: 'Esquisses pour le piano,
No. 2. — Budapest, Rozsnyai.)

(SCRIABIN: 'Etudes,' Op. 65, No. 2.—Moscow, Jurgenson.)

the 'tranquil charm of familiarity' is certainly absent; and if they fail to work on our spirits, it is perhaps because they excite us overmuch. That a time may come when a Scriabin, a Kodaly, or a Schönberg will have 'created the taste by which they are to be relished and taught the art by which they are to be seen' none can doubt, except for purely sentimental reasons. On the other hand it is equally possible, though (for reasons that are also sentimental) not very probable, that a whole body of artists who, working at the same time in different countries, have not reacted upon one another, should have irretrievably gone astray.

The fact remains that a minority of musicians, but a fairly important minority, have of late introduced into the musical idiom, in the shape of discords, hitherto unwonted means in greater number and in more sudden wise than had been the case at any former period. In his book on 'Style in musical art,' Sir Hubert Parry very aptly lays the general rule, that 'men do not look for new resources while existing resources are adequate.' So that unreservedly to endorse the tendencies embodied in works whose harmonic substance consists chiefly of novel unresolved discords implies, if not a condemnation of about nine-tenths of the contemporary output as made up of inadequate constituents, at least the assertion that an altogether new stage of evolution is near.

But the higher inferences to which the study of the problem of discord leads appertain to another matter, that of originality in musical art, which will form the subject of a special article.

ERICH J. WOLFF'S SONGS.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

Erich Wolff wrote, I believe, a Violin concerto and other works besides his songs, but it is only as a song-writer that I know him. He was not one of the elect, but he has produced two or three songs that ought to keep his name alive. He belongs to a type that is always plentiful after a period that has been fructified by the work of a number of really big men. He had no great depth of feeling himself, but he had the faculty of imagining that he was feeling deeply, and he had extracted from past and contemporary music a very fluent and effective technique. Whatever other faults his songs may have, they are at all events quite well made and carefully 'shop-finished.' Song-writing comes as easy to the average German musician as cricket to the average Englishman. Whatever else the German can or cannot do, he is always safe for at least two good songs in the course of his career. Men like Bungert, Max Bruch, Henning von Koss, Fritz Koegel, d'Albert, Fielitz, Gerlach, Nicodé, Mahler, Xaver Scharwenka, Weingartner, Hans Sommer, Wallnöfer, and no doubt scores of others, can on occasion turn out a song or two that none of the great masters of the Lied would have been ashamed to sign.

Erich Wolff was on the whole perhaps not the intellectual or emotional equal of any of the men I have just named: he has not even the imaginative force of an amateur like Koegel, though Koegel had nothing like his technique. Wolff has not, I think, written a single song that can be called really great. He often essayed the big manner, but it suited him ill. That he believed in himself is shown by his attempting fresh settings of such poems as Mignon's 'Kennst du das Land,'—of which Hugo Wolf and one or two others have probably exhausted the musical possibilities—and Hölderlin's 'Hyperions Schicksalslied,' which Brahms set once for all as the 'Song of Destiny.' In these songs, as in 'Drum sollst du dulden, Mensch,' 'Felsenstimmen,' 'Der Steinklopfer,' 'Tag meines Lebens,' 'Der einsame Pfeiffer,' 'Waldeinsamkeit,' 'Meeresstille,' 'Dann losch das Licht,' 'Todessehnen,' 'Sehnsucht,' and others, he is only aping the great manner; even at its most successful the music never gets beyond imitation. These are not emotions he has really felt, but only emotions he felt he ought to have felt. When he sings of his longing for death, for example, or his inability to live another day after some young lady has refused to look at him, one is inclined to say 'Nonsense, my little man; you don't believe a word of what you are saying. Don't pretend to worry about things that only concern your elders; one suck at a stick of chocolate and you will have forgotten all about it.' There is nothing big or broad or deep in his emotion or his longing; and all his more ambitious songs fail from his inability to draw a single drastically clear and cutting outline. There is a sentimental softness in all his figures, even when they imagine themselves to be most bitter, most grievous, most philosophical.

In a lighter vein he was more successful; he had something of that childlike love for the little, simple, homely things of life that makes it almost impossible for a German to write a poor song about children. We get at once the richest and tenderest flower of this spirit, perhaps, in Humperdinck's 'Hänsel und Gretel'; but it runs through almost all German music—an overflowing love of and sympathy for little lives of all kinds. Erich Wolff has left some delightful specimens in this genre, notably the 'Fitzebutte,' the 'Frisch vom Storch,' and the 'Christkindleins Wiegenlied.' He is generally successful again in his imitations—or re-creations—of the folk-tone, as in 'Die Lor' sitzt im Garten.' For the rest, he has produced a number of songs that are like little pastels, small but not false in sentiment, delicate in atmosphere, and thoroughly competent in workmanship. His best song is probably 'Du bist so jung.' Others in which, by remaining in his native little circle of delicate sentiment, he does all he aimed at doing, are the 'Sieh, wo du bist ist Frühling,' 'Die Spinnerin,' 'Das Gärtlein dicht verschlossen,' 'Einen Sommer lang,' 'Sommer,' 'Im Kahn,' 'In einem Garten,' 'Fäden,' 'Spaziergang,' 'Schlummerliedchen,' 'Aus der Ferne in die Nacht,' 'Bienenlied,' 'Frau Nachtigall,' 'Knabe und Veilchen,' and 'Selig mit blutendem Herzen.' We have only to compare these, or indeed any songs of Erich Wolff, with those of the average good English songwriter to realise how much national atmosphere counts for in music,—not national genius, for there is no such thing, but national atmosphere. Wolff was essentially no more gifted than hundreds of young Englishmen. He wrote, like them, for the market as much as for himself: but his was a better market than theirs. The Germans write better music on every plane than we do simply because the standard of each plane,—even the lower ones—is higher than ours; just as the average Frenchman writes better prose than the average German because France has developed a prose tradition and Germany has not. The Germans have the tradition in music. It will not turn a little man of talent into a genius, or even into a big talent: but it ensures the little man the protective backing of a great style, a great technique, and a great fund of ideas. It is just this backing, rather than anything great in himself, that lifts Erich Wolff's work above that of Englishmen who may have started from the same intellectual and musical level.

[Erich Wolff died in America, on March 19, whilst on tour with Miss Elena Gerhardt. He was a pianoforte accompanist of rare distinction, and, as stated in the above article, he made his mark as a song composer. He was born in Vienna, and he spent some years in Berlin. We have not been able to gather full particulars of his career. He was about thirty-five years of age. Much sympathy is felt for his young widow.]

We remind our readers that in June a Jubilee Festival will be held in honour of M. Saint-Saëns, who entered upon his musical career in 1838, as a prodigy pianist aged two-and-a-half years. As already announced, there will be an orchestral concert by the Beecham Orchestra, at Queen's Hall, on June 2, and later a performance of 'Samson et Dalila' at Covent Garden. We understand that M. Saint-Saëns is assiduously reviving his technique, with a view to his appearance as solo pianist. It is expected that the programme will include his C minor Symphony for orchestra, with organ. Widespread interest is being taken in the Festival, and we are gratified to hear that Queen Alexandra has also graciously lent her patronage. The honorary secretary is Mr. Hermann Klein, 40, Avenue Road, N.W.

Occasional Notes.

In the Russian Review (a quarterly magazine in English, published by Thomas Nelson & Sons, London, &c.) for February, Mrs. Rosa Newmarch contributes a highly readable and informing article on 'Scriabin and contemporary Russian Music,' which had been read previously at a private gathering at the Halcyon Club. It is a succinct account of the recent history of musical development in Russia, and of the existing musical conditions in that country. Mrs. Newmarch says that twenty-five years ago the line of cleavage between the two chief schools of music in Russia was very strongly marked. The ultra-national school had their stronghold in St. Petersburg, and the other school, which was mainly in sympathy with Western ideas and more cosmopolitan, was in force at Moscow. She says that:

At present music in Russia has rebounded from the national ideal, and not, in my opinion, entirely to its detriment. The obligation to write always in a patriotic spirit, to choose only national subjects for opera and programme music, to set every line of the Russian poets to music, and to model every melody on the folk-tune pattern, gave to some of the later music of the nationalists an air of monotony and perfunctoriness. The younger generation grew a little weary of the burden of nationalism, and ceased to concern themselves with the solidarity of a particular school whose position had been won, and whose mission was accomplished. Something like a complete revolution has now taken place, and Moscow—once reproached for its cosmopolitanism, and lukewarm attitude towards the patriotic enthusiasms of the modern capital—is now upbraided for its conservatism and continued adherence to the traditions of Chaikovsky [Tchaikovsky].

Mrs. Newmarch then proceeds to trace the positions and achievements of Rakhmaninov, Glazounov, Rheinhold Glière (a composer who was born in 1875, and is little known in England), Alexandre Grechyaninov (born in 1864, and still less known in this country), and some of the composers prominently associated with the famous Russian Ballet, including Cherepnin and Stravinsky. Another composer, N. Medtner, whose name is unfamiliar to English ears, is also mentioned by Mrs. Newmarch. He is described as a musician of classical tendencies, influenced by Brahms. Lastly, Scriabin is discussed with some fulness, with special reference to his 'Prometheus,' a work which was recently produced by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, for the first time in England. Mrs. Newmarch concludes with a general estimate of the famous Russian musician's music, in the course of which she says:

It is understood that 'Prometheus' is only a step in the realisation of Scriabin's ideals. Regarding all art as religion, he aims, like Wagner, at a union of the arts which shall work together to induce an effulgent spiritual ecstasy, leading mankind to a genuine view of the higher spiritual planes. In this great religious ritual all the arts cannot play equally important parts. Those which are manifested through mediums incontestably subordinate to the will, such as music, poetry, and the plastic arts, will be dominant elements in the combination. Other elements, which are not subject to the will-power, such as light and perfume, take a secondary place in the scheme. These 'accompanying' arts are, however, capable of much further development than has hitherto been supposed.

We are informed that at the annual general meeting of the Royal Philharmonic Society the gratifying announcement was made that the finances of the Society are in a more satisfactory condition than they have been for many years past. The call on the guarantors has been smaller than it has been within recent memory, and would have been avoided altogether had it not been necessary to increase the orchestra almost invariably to over one hundred and ten players. In this connection it should not be forgotten that at the time when the present rates of subscription and admission were fixed, an orchestra of seventy-five to eighty-five players satisfied the requirements of composers and audiences alike. The most important event during the season was the granting of permission by His Majesty for the Society to be known henceforth as 'The Royal Philharmonic Society,' and another event which will influence the future of the Society is the inauguration and satisfactory growth of the Foundation Fund, the Trusteeship of which has been undertaken by Mr. Alderman and Sheriff E. E. Cooper, Mr. Charles E. Rube, and Mr. E. W. Nicholls. The Society has been strengthened by the election of sixty-two Associates and twenty-nine Fellows. Reference was also made to the bestowal of the Society's medal on Madame Tetrassini and Mr. Harold Bauer. M. Mengelberg and M. Safonoff were elected Honorary Members. With regard to next season the Directors announced an interesting new departure. Invitations have been issued to a number of native composers, whose names have not yet appeared on the Society's programmes, to submit to the reading committee any works they may have ready for production. Of the seven concerts of next season M. Mengelberg will conduct five.

The seventeenth season of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, which came to an end, as far as London is concerned, on April 19, has been not only one of great activity but one of exceptional interest. The work of the Orchestra has won such loyal and trustful support from the public that enterprise and experiment can be indulged in without their usual foreground of empty benches. To this we owe our renewed impressions of Strauss's 'Symphonia Domestica,' our first hearing of Mahler's seventh Symphony, and that memorable afternoon when Scriabine's 'Prometheus' was performed twice. However widely opinions may differ as to their aesthetic values, few will deny that these experiences were worth while. The Promenade Concerts of last autumn were the most fruitful season that has yet been held; and in its provincial work the Orchestra has been more than usually successful. We congratulate the directors on the artistic and financial position which their Orchestra has won, and we add our tribute of admiration for the purposefulness and ability of Sir Henry Wood.

The April number of S.I.M. contains matter of interest to English readers in the form of an article 'Haendel et l'Angleterre,' translated from the English of Mr. Bernard Shaw. It is of course amusing and overstated. The singing of the 'Hallelujah' chorus, says Mr. Shaw, is to the English Protestant mind what the elevation of the Host is to a Roman Catholic. We are told that the inclusion of the first e in the name Haendel is considered an act of impiety, and so forth. The chief object of the article is to protest against the gigantic scale of the Handel Festival performances, à propos which some pertinent remarks are made. The remaining articles in this number are 'Robert Schumann et la Revolution de 1848,' by Julien Tiersot, 'Les origines germaniques de César Franck,' by Ernest Closson, and 'Enquête sur la condition sociale du musicien,' by M. Daubresse.

An important competition is announced by the Kaiserliche Königliche Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, open to composers of all nationalities, who have at any time been students at the Vienna Conservatoire (K.K. Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst). It is held to commemorate the eightieth anniversary of the first performance of Beethoven's ninth Symphony, and of the Kyrie, Credo, Agnus Dei, and Dona nobis pacem of the 'Missa solemnis.' A prize of 2,000 kronen is offered for the best composition submitted, which should be in the form of an opera, oratorio, cantata, symphony, or sonata, for one or more instruments. MSS. are received between March 27 (the date of Beethoven's death), and December 16 (the date of his birth) this year. Only one work may be submitted by each competitor, and the usual form of motto and sealed envelope must be adopted. Messrs. Robert Fuchs, Hermann Graedener, Richard Heuberger, Robert Hirschfeld, Eduard Kremser, Mandyczewski, and Franz Schalk have consented to act as adjudicators.

NOTES ON ORGANS AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

The organs at St. George's Chapel Royal, Windsor, have been dealt with somewhat exhaustively in various numbers of the Musical Times, more particularly in the issues for November, 1909, and June, 1910. Except in one particular—Rimbault's statement that Adam Forssell built an organ for this building in 1635, quoted in the June, 1910, issue (p. 379), which I shall deal with in its proper place—I have nothing to add to what is already known of these organs, my remarks being confined to organs in other buildings in the Castle. These are three in number:

- I. The Wolsey Tomb-house, now the Albert Memorial Chapel.
- II. St. George's Hall.
- III. The Private Chapel at the end of St. George's Hall, formerly known as St. George's Chapel.

The first-named building stands at the east end of St. George's Chapel Royal, from which it is separated by a passage to the Cloisters. It was originally built by Henry III. and dedicated to Edward the Confessor, but Henry VII. pulled down the greater portion, his intention being to reconstruct it and make it his own mausoleum. Before its completion, however, he altered his mind, and built the beautiful chapel known by his name, at Westminster Abbey. His successor presented the unfinished chapel at Windsor to Cardinal Wolsey who, about the year 1524, proceeded to fashion it into a magnificent tomb for himself, according to the newly-introduced Italian style. Owing to his fall from power, Wolsey was not buried here, but for long afterwards the building was known as 'Wolsey's Tomb-house,' and even to this day is frequently so named.

During the Civil War and the Commonwealth much damage was done to the interior, but shortly after his accession James II. restored it at a cost of some £700, and during his short reign it was used as his private Chapel for Roman Catholic Services. It was for these services that Renatus Harris prepared and removed an organ from Winchester to Windsor.

After the abdication of James, a considerable period of decay followed, but about the beginning of the 19th century it was restored in accordance with the crude ideas of Gothic held by the elder Wyatt and his son Sir Jeffry Wyattville. George III.

had a royal vault constructed beneath it, the only entrance to which is by means of a sloping passage communicating with St. George's Chapel Royal. In this vault all the English Monarchs from George III. to Edward VII., have been buried.

Queen Victoria beautifully restored the chapel in memory of Prince Albert, and it is under the name of the Albert Memorial Chapel that it is now universally known and generally spoken of. The only organ that seems to have been placed in it is the one already referred to. How long this organ remained here after the Revolution of 1688—whether it was destroyed or removed—is not known.

II. The remaining two buildings—St. George's Hall and the Private Chapel—adjoin each other, so that at the present time the organ in the Hall, by means of a duplicate console in the Chapel, is available for services in the latter building. There is, of course, a separate front to both Chapel and Hall.

The first of two organs so constructed to serve both these buildings was built by Messrs. Hill & Son, and its specification—given in all three editions of Hopkins & Rimbault—was as follows:

GREAT ORGAN—CC to F.

	Feet.		Feet.
1. Double open and Bourdon	16	7. Flute	 4

ACCESSORIES.

4 Composition Pedals to Great organ, and 3 to Swell. Double-acting pneumatic piston for 'Great to Pedals,' on and off. 'Swell to Great' coupler, placed in Great organ key slip.

There are two entirely independent consoles, one in the Hall and one in the Private Chapel.

The builders' own system of tubular pneumatic action is used throughout, and the wind is supplied by means of a hydraulic engine.

III. In turning to the organs peculiar to the Private Chapel we come across matter of some historical interest, for we have information concerning a pre-Restoration instrument, and of another one by Father Smith.

The building itself appears to have been used as a chapel almost continuously since the days of Charles I., but was probably so used at a much earlier date. It has been variously styled 'St. George's Chapel,' 'The King's Chapel,' and of course 'The King's (or Queen's) Private Chapel.' The first title may have led to some confusion, so that it seems probable that one of the instruments said to have been built for the Collegiate Chapel is one which was most certainly constructed for this smaller building. Of this more will be said later.

The earliest mention of an instrument in the Private Chapel that I have yet come across is to be found amongst the Domestic State Papers, kept at the Record Office in Chancery Lane.* It is dated November 29, 1628, and reads as follows:

CHARLES R.

Charles by the grace of God &c. To the Trés and undertrés of o' Excheq^r for the tyme being greeting. Whereas we have given order for the making of a new Organ to be sett up in o' private Chappell in o' Castle at Windsore the charge whereof will amount to the some of one hundred and fortie pounds. Wee will and command you of o' treasure in the receipt of o' Excheq^r forthwth to pay or cause to be paid unto Adam Tocesle gent. or his assigns the said some of one hundred and forty pounds of lawfull money of England to be employed for the service aforesaid, and wthout accompt imprest or other charge to be sett upon him his heirs exers or assigns for the same or for any part or parcel thereof. And these &c., given, &c.

WINDEBANK.

I believe that this document is the foundation upon which Rimbault based his statement that Adam Fortress built an organ for St. George's Chapel in 1635 at a cost of £140.† Indistinct writing would easily account for the errors in both date and surname. (Curiously enough, the printed index and summary of the State Paper is also wrong, the form the name takes there being Torlesse.) Whether Tocesle and Fortress are two distinct personages—or, as I believe, one and the same—the wording of the above document seems to point to the fact that Adam Tocesle was not an organ-builder, but an official entrusted with the task of selecting a builder, and of exercising some kind of supervision over the construction of the instrument in question.

Since Charles II. did not order a new organ to take the place of this one till 1673, there is some probability that the organ of 1628 was one of the few which are known to have survived the period of the Great Rebellion. Possibly, also, some parts of it were incorporated in the new instrument which was built by Father Smith in—or just previous to—the year 1673, at a cost estimated at £200; which, however, finally amounted to £310.

Here is the first of three documents bearing upon Smith and his organ :*

Unfortunately the "annexed Bill" is not included amongst the other papers, so that we do not know what the 'extras' were, but the next document‡ tells us that they came to £110, and that Purcell approved them :—

To S^r Ro : Howard.

Turning to 'The King's Musick' we find several entries* which refer to this instrument and the chapel in which it stood. Included with other charges in a bill of 'Mr. John Hingston, keeper and repairer of all his Majesty's organs, in his Chappells and Privy Lodgings, all harpsichords, pedalls and all other instruments,' and dated February 7, 1675-76, are the following items :

- (1) 1673. For portage of his Majesty's chamber organ and to Bernard Smyth for his charge to Windsor £2 10 o.
- (2) 1674. For my charges to Windsor in giving order to make a new loft for the new organ there and seeing it placed there at severall tymes, 14 dayes £5 0 o.
- (3) To George Wyat for blowing the organ at Whitehall, and for his journey to and time att Windsor, 15 weekes. £12 10 o.
- (4) 1675, June. For my charges to and at Windsor 4 days to putt his Majesty's organ in the Chappell in order against his coming thither £1 10 o.
- (5) To Mr. Smyth, organ maker for his charges and his worke there £2 10 o.
- (6) September. For my charges to Windsor, and for 20 yards of sail cloth to cover and secure the organ there from the weather and dust. £1 10 o.
- (7) To one to blow the organ, his Majesty being at Windsor £1 10 o.

This bill is 'signed by N. Staggin, master of the musick.'

Further items are to be found in two other of Hingston's bills, ordered to be paid on August 19, 1678, and December 25, 1683, respectively, where his 'charges to Windsor with an organ maker and two men to mend and tune the organ in his Majesty's Chappell' amounted to £7 10s. 6d. in the one case, and to £3 in the other.

Another interesting extract, dated April 8, 1679, is an 'Order to pay Mr. Thomas Blagrove the sum of £224 8 o due to sixteen gentlemen and one organist of his Majesty's Chappell Royall for their riding charges and other expenses in their attendance on his Majesty at Windsor for forty-four days, from 14 August to 26 September, 1678, at 6s. per diem to each of them. [Here follow the names of Thomas Purcell and fifteen other gentlemen.] Dr. John Blow, organist. Also the following children of the Chapel for the like at 3s. per diem, amounting to £52 16s. [Here are the names of eight children, including those of Vaughan Richardson and Daniel Purcell.] And to Dr. John Blow, master of the children of the Chappell for the same at 6s. per diem—£13 4s.

In confirmation of the contention that the documents above quoted refer to the organ in the Private Chapel (and not to that in St. George's Chapel Royal), and in order to show that the said Private Chapel was in use till the end of the 18th century (and probably later), the following extracts from an old guide book 'Windsor and its environs,' published in 1774, are here given :

'St. George's, or the King's Chapel.

'Adjoining to St. George's hall, is the royal chapel, the ceiling of which represents, in a most lively manner, the Ascension of our Saviour, accompanied by a numerous host of Angels. . . . The altar piece is adorned with a painting of the last supper ; and the room, in which our Saviour and his apostles are supposed to be in (sic) has a dome, through which is seen the organ belonging to the chapel. . . .

* They are to be found between pages 298 and 362, and cover the years 1673-83 (inclusive).

'The closets of the King and royal family form the east end of this chapel. . . . The sovereign always goes to chapel in great state.

'It ought not to be omitted, that the carved work of this chapel is highly worthy the attention of the curious, it being executed by Gibbons, in lime-tree.'

'The Windsor Guide' of 1792 makes no mention of the organ, but states that 'In this chapel, which is adjoining to St. George's Hall, divine service is performed every morning, during his Majesty's summer residence at Windsor, at eight o'clock.'

The position of this organ (above the altar) is unusual but by no means unique in England. The organ at Leominster Priory Church was so placed as late as 1860, whilst those at Whitchurch (Edgware) and Marlborough House Chapel are still so situated. Other instances that come to mind are (or were) to be found at St. George's, Brighton, and Kew Church. The curious treatment of the organ-case in the scheme of the altar-piece is, however, very remarkable.

I think it will be generally acknowledged that the instrument built (or rebuilt) by Father Smith was the one referred to above, but how long it remained in the Private Chapel after 1774 I cannot say. It may have remained there till 1842 (which appears to have been the time when the chapel was 'restored in the Gothic style'). It had disappeared for certain by 1843, in which year another instrument, whose history is rather involved, was set up in the chapel. According to Hamilton's 'Catechism of the Organ,' 'The organs in the Queen's private chapels at Buckingham Palace and Windsor Castle originally formed one instrument, built by Messrs. Gray & Davison for the Music Room, Windsor Castle, in 1842; but on the alterations, consequent on the formation of the present private chapels, taking place in 1843, it was divided and rebuilt. The one part, or Great organ, was adapted to the chapel at Buckingham Palace, and the other, consisting of the large swell and pedal pipes, now forms the instrument in the chapel at Windsor Castle.' When describing the Buckingham Palace portion, the writer (the late Joseph Warren) adds: 'Some of the pipes of this organ are the work of Green, and formed part of a favourite instrument of His Majesty George the Third.' (This would be the small organ at Windsor Castle which Sir John Sutton tells us that Green built for the King's private use.)*

It would be interesting to know what became of this organ and of the Hill organ which followed it (already referred to), which was itself superseded in 1889.

Let us turn once more to the Father Smith organ, and also to a letter which appeared in Musical Times for July, 1910, written by Mr. Henry T. Gilberthorpe. In this letter Mr. Gilberthorpe mentions the local tradition that the present organ in St. Mary's Church, Walton-on-Thames, was built by Father Smith, that it came from St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and that it was presented to the church by Queen Victoria.

Supposing that the 1673 instrument remained at Windsor till 1837, and that it was removed thence between that year and 1842, it will be seen that it is not only possible, but even probable, that it and the Walton organ are the same.

On the other hand, Brayley's 'Topographical History of Surrey' (published in 1841), speaking of the Walton organ, makes no mention of Queen Victoria as the donor, limits the years during which the Queen could have given it to Walton to four, and seems also to speak as if the organ had occupied its present position for many years—possibly from 1779.

Here is the passage :

'Above the aisles, and across the west end, are large galleries: the latter contains a finely-toned organ by Father Schmidt, which includes the following stops: sesquialtra, fifteenth, principal, stop-diapason bass, open diapason, cornet treble, principal treble, dulciana, stop-diapason treble. The high-pointed arch which opened from the tower, at the back of the organ-gallery, was enclosed in the year 1779.*'

By a comparison of dates it will be seen that the Walton traditions fit in with the history (so far as known) of the Windsor instrument, excepting that if the date of its erection at Walton be between 1779 and 1837, the donor could not have been her late Majesty. (There is no evidence in Brayley against the date 1837-40, only inference.)

Further, if the Walton mentioned by Rimbault amongst the list of places for which Green built organs is Walton-on-Thames (Rimbault gives no date), the fact tells in favour of the traditions. For if Green built a new organ it has been removed to make room for the present one by Father Smith, while if he merely moved the Smith organ from Windsor to Walton, after effecting certain necessary repairs, that fact would be quite sufficient to connect his name with the organ in question. One thing is quite certain, that the case and front pipes and many of the old interior pipes are not the handiwork of Green, though they may be that of Father Smith, and some of them, possibly, of even earlier date. If therefore we accept Green's name in connection with the present Walton instrument, it is merely as remover and restorer, and the effect of our acceptance is to substitute George III. or Queen Caroline for Queen Victoria amongst the benefactors to the church.

To sum up, I think it very likely that the organ which Father Smith built for the private chapel of Charles II. about the year 1673 was removed to the Parish Church, Walton-on-Thames, where it now is, sometime between the years 1779 and 1840. More than this I should not venture to say.

* 'A Short Account of Organs' (1847), pp. 81, 85.

* Vol. ii., p. 323.

As the organ at Walton is of no little interest apart from these speculations as to its origin, I append a brief account of it as I found it in August and September, 1910, when by the kindness of Mr. Gilberthorpe I was able to try it, and by the courtesy of the vicar I was permitted to take a photograph of the case.

The instrument still occupies its original position in the West Gallery. It is enclosed in a carved case with panelled sides. Of the merits of the carving it is impossible to give any opinion, for the whole of the woodwork is heavily coated with yellow paint. The front pipes, which are decorated in blue, gold, and red, are arranged in three towers—a large round tower in the centre with five pipes, on either side of it a two-storied flat containing small pipes (three of which are missing), and at either end a V-tower with five pipes. None of these front-pipes appear to have been voiced, nor do they seem to have been connected with the sound-board in any way at any time. The tone of the Stopped Diapason on the Great organ is very piquant: it is quite a delightful old-world stop.

All the old pipes appear to have been preserved, but when the Swell and Pedal organs were added, and the compass of the Great keys extended upwards to G, no new pipes were added to the four upper notes. The Great organ keys are therefore silent above E except when the Swell to Great is drawn.

The organ has been rebuilt by Hedgeland and by Bishop.

HUGO VON HOFMANNSTHAL.

BY D. C. PARKER.

While much has been written regarding the music of 'Der Rosenkavalier' a great amount of attention has also been directed to the libretto, and neither in Germany nor in England are the critics agreed that Hofmannsthal's 'book' is entirely suitable for operatic treatment. History teaches that a libretto has much to do with the success or failure of an opera. It is true that many operas survive which are set to dull and featureless libretti. In such cases the music and the music alone has been able to rescue the works from oblivion. In other cases a concise and well-written libretto has been spoiled by being associated with poor music. There is no doubt that in the past many musicians were far too easily pleased with the books offered to them. Frequently, of course, good musicians found a great difficulty in obtaining texts suitable for their purpose. But the importance of a good libretto is now recognised, and this fact has arisen from past experience. How much 'Euryanthe,' 'Alfonso and Estrella' and 'Rosamunde' suffered because the libretti were not found interesting it would be difficult to say. It is obvious, therefore, that the position of the librettist is an important one. Different composers, of course, view the matter in different ways. Beethoven was more fastidious about the subject and its sentiment than about the actual form of it. The prolific and ubiquitous Scribe seemed to many musicians an ideal associate, if only because of his popularity, and the ready market which he found for his wares. In his last two operas Verdi set adaptations from Shakespeare made by Boito, a man whose literary accomplishments are apt to be overlooked because his music is not great in any real sense. All this proves that the librettist is a person of importance in an opera, and he has become more prominent since Wagner wrote his own poems and took a vast amount of trouble over them.

In considering 'Der Rosenkavalier,' it must not be forgotten that the composer has a great advantage over the librettist. Although Strauss has conjured up the Vienna of Maria Theresa's time by using the Mozartian idiom and by introducing dance measures, these are readily understood by the intelligent musician. Similar proceedings on the part of the poet, however, are likely to miss fire unless the audience know intimately the language which is used. It is possible, therefore, that where the local allusions of the musician are recognised, those of the poet are misunderstood or overlooked. For this reason it may not be out of place to remind readers that Hofmannsthal has made a position for himself in Germany. Like Max Rheinhardt and Strauss, he has his enthusiastic devotees and his detractors. He has been bracketed with Hauptmann and some of the best writers of the past, and has been called the unworthy colleague of a great composer. More than once he has given evidence of a liking for scenes of southern passion and beauty. But he is not always merely a graceful writer, for in one of his plays at least he turns towards philosophy and comes near to the static drama of Maeterlinck. Indeed, one of the characteristics of Hofmannsthal is that he has experimented in subjects and forms quite as much as Strauss himself. He has shown a love for Italian settings to his works, but he has also exhibited a profound interest in the Greek drama. It is probably by his modern versions of Sophocles that Hofmannsthal is best known outside of Germany. Whatever the verbal merit of 'Elektra,' it cannot be denied that the great shortcoming of the work lies in the fact that it is modern and Teutonic where it should have been full of the restraint of Greece. The classical setting and classical names do not avail when we witness a whirlwind of passion and hatred which is brought to a finish by a 'nameless dance.' I am not criticising the text or the music, but simply the atmosphere which Hofmannsthal creates. As regards 'Der Rosenkavalier' opinions, as I have said, are divided. The humour of the work may appear forced to some, but nothing in the world is so national, aye parochial, as humour. Until it was understood the humour of 'Die Meistersinger' was considered to be forced also. The English like their humour to be served in the bluff and hearty manner of 'The Pickwick Papers,' and, this being so, 'Der Rosenkavalier' may seem a trifle slow on the comic side.

It is probable that it is offered to the public as a contrast to 'Elektra,' much in the same way as 'Die Meistersinger' was written as a pendant to 'Tannhäuser.' Whether Hofmannsthal has been successful in recreating the rococo pictures of Vienna, each one must decide for himself. But it is, perhaps, worth pointing out that Strauss has chosen as his fellow-worker one who is regarded as one of the finest poets of modern Germany, and who, though still a young man, has already given ample proof of poetical gifts of a high order.

A SPANISH LYRIC-DRAMA AT NICE.

At the Casino Municipal at Nice, a lyric-drama in two acts, 'La Vida Breve,' has been produced. The poem is by Carlos Fernandez Shaw, the music by Manuel de Falla, one of the most prominent among the few young composers actually labouring to raise the Spanish school to a level not unworthy of its glorious far-distant past.

From the time (18th century) when it lost the tradition of its older masters and yielded to the influence of already degenerate Italian operatic music, the Spanish school produced no music of artistic value until the contemporary period. Its revival during the latter half of the 19th century is chiefly due to the initiative of a few artists among whom M. Felipe Pedrell stands foremost.

M. Manuel de Falla, born at Cadiz in 1876, is a pupil of M. Pedrell, and strongly asserts the nationalistic tendencies of which his master has ever been the uncompromising apostle. He has written little, and his only published works—all of them published in France, where he settled after having completed his education—are, besides 'La Vida Breve,' a set of pianoforte pieces and three songs. But that little is enough to reveal his individuality and to speak highly in his favour.

The score of 'La Vida Breve,' for instance—which was awarded in 1905 the Grand Prize of the Madrid Academy of the Fine Arts, to be published and produced in 1913 only, and out of Spain—is at all points original and impressive; it shows not only the composer's fine musicianship, but his remarkable sense of dramatic proprieties. In 'La Vida Breve' one can but acknowledge a 'veristic' lyric-drama. It is founded on a short sensational episode, the tenor of which is: Salud, a gipsy girl, loves Paco, who deserts her to marry 'the highly-popular character called Another.' She appears at the feast given for the betrothal, to reproach her faithless lover, and falls dead at his feet. However, the work as a whole is as artistic as the Italian veristic works are the reverse. The difference lies primarily in the treatment, which is never coarse nor meretricious. The poem has wisely been written so as to leave the composer many occasions of asserting the true rights of music. And M. de Falla's music never plays a subordinate part: not only because it is beautiful, but for the reason that the poem has been planned with so steady a view to that end. In the first scene, melancholy songs and hammer-strokes coming from a smithy in the background create an atmosphere of portentous sadness. At the close of the Act the stage exhibits a panoramic view of Granada at night, seen from a terrace across which lovers in couples glide silently, whilst the orchestra and the choir unite in a superb symphony that forcibly expresses the all-potent sway of love, mainspring of the whole drama.

In such scenes, as well as in the third (the rejoicings at the house of the betrothed), M. de Falla has displayed abundant imagination, feeling, and skill. His music is not to be considered as written more or less artificially after the fashion of Andalusian folk-music, but as an unaffected, spontaneous, eloquent utterance, of which many idiosyncrasies in rhythm, in modality, and in melodic design, reveal the Andalusian origin.

From this point of view, it deserves close study, as well as for its exquisitely light and effective scoring. But such technical merits of course play only a subordinate part; it is chiefly for its earnest and fervid tone that 'La Vida Breve' is admirable.

The production has been attended with great care. Special commendation is due to Mrs. Lillian Grenville, who appeared in the part of Salud, and to M. Jacques Miranne, the conductor.

FRESH LIGHT ON OLD ENGLISH AIRS.

By W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

Exact transcript of melody as printed in Exshaw's Magazine (Dublin) for September, 1794. From copy in the Royal Irish Academy.

The average musical reader may imagine that the last word has been said on the origin of 'The girl I left behind me' in the article contributed by Mr. Kidson to the concluding volume of the new 'Grove' * as recently as 1910 (vol. v., p. 642b). Of course Mr. Kidson endeavours to uphold Chappell's view, and he elaborates the note on the same subject in his 'English Songs of the Georgian Period,' published in 1907. There is just one little difference. In the latter work he states that original printed copies of the air can only be traced to the year 1810 or 'the early years of the 19th century,' but in the new 'Grove' he is inclined to believe that the tune was printed 'at the end of the 18th century.' Another writer (Mr. Henry Davey) states that 'the tune is somewhat older and possibly Irish.'

It may be well once and for all to dismiss the erroneous views of the late Mr. Chappell, who fixes the date of 'Brighton Camp' as 1758, and who had a hazy recollection of seeing a copy of the song formerly belonging to Dr. Rimbault, 'in date about 1770.' Mr. Kidson endeavours to get over the difficulty as to the name 'Brighton Camp' by assuming that Brighton 'was a local pronunciation long before it became officially recognized.' But this is mere assumption, and it is absolutely certain that the song of 'Brighton Camp' could not have been written in 1758, nor yet in 1770, nor even in 1785. Brighton was invariably known as 'Brightelmstone' until after the year 1786, and even as late as November 4, 1798, I find an official letter from Lord Camden dated from 'Brightelmstone'; thus internal evidence disproves an earlier date for 'Brighton Camp' than circa 1790. However, it is of importance to note that the actual military camp at Brighton was only formed in the years 1793-5. But I can adduce stronger evidence as against the age of 'Brighton Camp.'

Some months back, in looking through a volume of old dance music, I came across a tune headed 'Brighton Camp,' and it immediately arrested my attention. Judge of my surprise when I found that it was quite a different tune from the one which has been claimed as English. I herewith subjoin the musical setting of 'Brighton Camp' as printed by Cahusac in 1794. It is taken from his 'Twenty-four Country Dances for 1794':

'BRIGHTON CAMP.'

CAHUSAC'S 24 Country Dances or 1794.

Thus in England in 1794 a tune called 'Brighton Camp' was in vogue, and it was not till after Christmas of that year, or early in 1795, that the Irish air of 'The girl I left behind me' was set to slightly varied words, and re-christened 'Brighton Camp.' From 1795 to 1825 it was indifferently known in England as 'The girl I left behind me,' or 'Brighton Camp.'

In Mr. Kidson's article in the new 'Grove,' as also in his notes to 'English Songs,' he tells us that the earliest appearance in print of the tune under the title 'Brighton Camp' is in 'The Gentleman's Amusement,' circa 1810, and he adds that the earliest printed version of 'The girl I left behind me' is in a MS. book, circa 1815. These versions are practically the same.

Now comes the surprising statement of Chappell that Tom Moore, in 1818, was the first to claim the tune as Irish, and this is repeated by Mr. Kidson, although his collaborator, Mr. Alfred Moffat, frankly admits the Irish origin of the tune. The fact is that the tune was known in Ireland in 1780 under the Irish name of 'An Spailpin Fanach,' and it has all the well-known characteristics of an Irish air. Furthermore, the English song of 'The girl I left behind me' was of Irish provenance, and was written by an Irishman about the year 1792, or perhaps earlier. As frequently happened, a slight alteration of the words took place in 1795, to suit English tastes, and hence it began to be regarded as an English song after the year 1810.

And now for a further confirmation of the Irish claim to this song and tune. No English printed version has been traced earlier than 1798;* in fact,

Mr. Kidson states that the earliest he could find was circa 1810. Fortunately, there is in the National Library in Dublin a printed copy of 'The girl I left behind me,' published in Dublin in Exshaw's Magazine for September, 1794. Moreover, in a popular song-book called 'Paddy's Resource,' printed in Belfast in 1795, there is a fine lyric directed to be sung to the tune of 'The girl I left behind me.' The metre of the English song is taken from the Irish, 'An Spailpin Fanach,' which was in great vogue in the years 1795-98, and is still popular at Irish gatherings; and there is no mistaking the Irish origin of the old version of 'The girl I left behind me.'

Tom Moore's memory of the song and tune went back to 1790; and Bunting took it down from Arthur O'Neill in 1804. Although Moore's version 'As slow our ship' was not printed till 1818, yet he wrote other words for the Irish tune in 1815. In a Dublin song-book of 1810 I find 'The girl I left behind me' included among the Irish lyrics. I have also a MS. setting of the tune in a music book copied between the years 1795-98. Yet the Dublin printed copy of September, 1794, points more definitely to an Irish origin than anything yet discovered, and corroborates the Irish ascription as admitted by Mr. Alfred Moffat, Mr. Henry Davey, and Dr. Ernest Walker.

In conclusion, it is to be hoped that future investigators will admit the Irish origin of this fine marching tune, which was for close on a century the favourite farewell melody played by Irish (and other) regimental bands in the British service. Nor must it be forgotten that the name of 'Brighton Camp,' as set to the Irish tune of 'The girl I left behind me,' in 1794, was imitated a few years later in a North of England song, entitled 'Blyth Camp,' quoted in Bell's 'Rhymes of Northern Bards,' published in 1812 at Newcastle-on-Tyne. I would also request the interested reader to notice the decided Irishisms in the revised English song as quoted by Chappell in 1838 in his 'Collection of National English Airs.' These Irishisms are still more marked in the original Anglo-Irish song as printed early in the 19th century. Chappell's version of the song is most decidedly tinkered to suit modern taste.

Church and Organ Music.

'THE REFORM OF CHURCH MUSIC.'

Mr. Jerry Cruncher was always accusing Mrs. Cruncher of 'floppin,' but he had less excuse for complaining than we have at the constantly-recurring war cry of 'The reform of church music.' Someone—and too often a 'nobody'—suddenly blossoms forth in print, telling us that all that exists is wrong. The Westminster Gazette has recently opened its columns to the subject, and it will hardly be believed that one correspondent actually denounces the Church Music Society as 'admirable, but absurdly diffident!' Another seems to labour under the delusion that because she cannot sing the Creed and Gloria without a good deal of difficulty, there is something wrong. We are told, again, that the organist of Manchester Cathedral is a member of the Church Music Society. One wonders whether Mr. Nicholson would appreciate the attempts of all and sundry to join in those parts of the Service which he has so admirably trained his choir to sing? We think not.

The lady correspondent referred to asks, 'Are they [a good many choirs up and down the country] semi-ecclesiastical concert parties, or are they to lead the congregation in singing?' The reply is that if the choirs sang concert music they might deserve the name; but as their efforts are directed towards making the service musically attractive (and they are usually keen and reverent), they deserve every consideration and some respect. If the congregations are not satisfied, why do they not form themselves into choirs? It is the old, old story of the old man, his son, and the donkey. We have no patience with the grumbler, but keep our eyes steadily on the undoubted fact that the middle course is the safe one, and that though there must be extremes in every cause, neither has much lasting power, though they certainly do something towards keeping the balance steady. We all of us know the misery that attendance at church brings to many by the unmusical efforts of 'that awful woman with the cracked voice just behind.' Such an one is more likely to deter a devout worshipper than would his disability to join in the singing. A correspondent also objects to the fine tune to 'Hear My law, O My people' being displaced by another. The tune first referred to is no doubt Oakeley's Quadruple Chant; which a well-known clergyman recently dismissed with the expression 'I can't abide it.' Where do we stand, then? Who is to judge of what is best? Is the average church-goer better trained than the man whose life is given to the study of church music? It must be sorrowfully admitted that the amount of the pseudo church-music now in existence and constant use is simply deplorable. It is also true that many choirs attempt music beyond their powers, and there is here and there a tendency to over-rate the importance of music in church. One of the truest things ever penned comes from a correspondent who says: 'An organist is a rarity, and a choir-trainer a phenomenon.' This may be due to the fact that 'the salary of a first-class organist is one that would be rejected by a second-rate stockbroker's clerk.' There is another possible reason, and may be found in the constant opposition and criticism levelled against the organist and those responsible with him for the music. Frequent blame and very rare praise are what they have been trained to expect, and they are seldom agreeably disappointed. It has been said before in these columns that music is the only art which is thought to be within everyone's reach. Our congregations are not allowed to redecorate the churches in accordance with their own ideas, nor may they carry out their original principles of architecture. Why in the name of wonder they should air their grievances on church music is beyond our comprehension. Poor music! How many a bitter controversy has been aroused by mere pretence of knowledge, when its first principles have yet to be mastered! As to the future, is there any hope of the healing of these unhappy divisions? Musical education of the masses of the people is the only means of raising popular taste. The Church Music Society has no doubt the highest objects in view, but how can uneducated people even dimly understand, still less like, such music as the Society would authorise for use in church. So long as musical comedy attracts the crowd, just so long will their musical education be retarded, and any possibility of their understanding the high ideal of church music prevented. There are many who think that the religious life of the country is feeblener than it was, and that people would rather be amused and carried lightly from one pleasure to another. There are many reasons for dreading the possibility of such a position, and as regards music generally, it rests with musicians to do all that is possible to improve the taste of the multitude in all that makes for humility, and veneration for those who have worked and are working in the highest realms of art. Musical education is, we believe, the only possible means by which the taste in church music can be raised, and it will not be done in the life of this generation. We shall still have to wade through the complaints and grievances of those who would put the world straight in five minutes, if they were given the opportunity. In the meantime, let all who can make every effort to uphold the standard of good music, whether secular or sacred, and await the result with the conviction that the best will in the end survive.

The Organists' Association is a welcome sign of the times, as by its influence the members of the profession are brought into closer touch with one another, leaving less room for the petty jealousies which have undoubtedly done so much harm in the past. These undesirable relations have been the natural result of the lack of co-operation which has for so long existed. Among the more strenuous of the Associations is that centered in Huddersfield, and such meetings as one recently held there can have at least the good result of bringing into friendly intercourse the organists of the neighbourhood, while the most interesting lantern lecture by Mr. Frederick Lee must have been greatly appreciated, giving subjects for conversation at once amusing and improving. As the lecturer truly said: 'A great many people go through life without seeing the many beauties and objects of interest by which they are surrounded.' Organists are certainly prone to talk 'shop,' as are musicians generally, and the subject of the lecture 'Some old churches, times, and characters,' though not without dangers in that respect, gave a chance of discussing something besides 'What sort of vicar?' 'How many stops?' 'Do you like radiating pedals?' &c., and the endless similar questions to be heard where organists most do congregate. If the Organists' Association can in time produce the all-round man, that is to say, the man who can prove his possession of general knowledge of men and things, who can discuss politics, or literature, or science, or any branch of art, besides his eternal organ-loft, it will have done far more than merely justify its existence. Its influence is all for good, and we hope to find Associations forming in every district, thus extending knowledge and culture, and widening the social standing of the organist.

We have received a copy of the third annual report of the Organists' Benevolent League, which, it will be remembered, was founded by Sir Frederick Bridge in 1909. It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of such an institution, and the wide recognition it has already commanded is sufficient to justify the satisfaction felt by all concerned with the inner workings of the body. It is important to remember that the League is entirely undenominational, every case being considered by the committee solely on its merits, irrespective of the status of the applicant. Also that if it be found impracticable to give the whole of the proceeds of a recital, concert, lecture, or other entertainment, such proceeds might be divided between some local object and the Organists' Benevolent League. Sir Frederick Bridge's idea is that rather than a donation, those desirous of helping the League should give the proceeds of some effort of their own. We urge, with all the power we can command, upon all interested in the organist and his work, the immense importance of bringing before the clergy and churchwardens the highly deserving nature of the League, and feel sure that when the matter is fully understood the president will have the satisfaction of seeing his ambition crowned with the great success it deserves. The relief, so far as the committee have been able to extend it, has proved a real help to many of the profession who have fallen on evil times, and it is hoped to offer a pension (even if a small one), which is far better than temporary assistance. From the statement of accounts we see the League already possesses a balance of nearly £700, which should encourage the committee and those desirous of assisting by their own efforts. Copies of the report or of forms of undertaking to help, &c., may be obtained of the secretary, Mr. T. Shindler (Registrar of the College), at the Royal College of Organists, Kensington Gore, S.W.

We learn with gratification that Sir George Martin is to be the recipient of a testimonial, in recognition of his distinguished services as organist of St. Paul's Cathedral.

We congratulate Dr. E. C. Bairstow upon his appointment to the position of organist at York Minster, in succession to Mr. T. Tertius Noble. He is a musician of exceptional gifts as an organist, teacher, and composer, and we are confident that under his guidance the high traditions of the Minster will be maintained. Dr. Bairstow was born at Huddersfield in 1874, and became a pupil of Mr. Henry Parratt (the brother of Sir Walter), Mr. John Farmer, and afterwards Sir Frederick Bridge, whom he assisted from 1895 to 1899. His subsequent posts have been at All Saints', Norfolk Square, Wigan Parish Church and Leeds Parish Church. He is a Doctor of Music of Durham University, and a Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

The post of organist of Leeds Parish Church is vacant by the appointment of Dr. Bairstow to York Minster, and the Vicar of Leeds (Dr. Bickersteth), who has the nomination of his successor, asks us to state that he has associated with him as a committee of selection the Rev. A. M. Sullivan (precentor), Mr. Richard Wilson and Mr. G. H. Leather (churchwardens), and Mr. W. Whitehead (churchwarden and choir-treasurer). All applications should be addressed to the Rev. The Precentor, Parish Church, Leeds.

The history of the organ and organists of Ripon Cathedral forms the subject of an interesting booklet that has been compiled by Mr. C. H. Moody, organist and choirmaster of the Cathedral. The earliest record of the Cathedral music dates back to 1399, when repairs to the organ involved the following outlay:

'Two horses' skins for two pairs of new bellows, 2s. 8d.
Two calves' skins and two sheeps' skins for same, 1s. 6d.
Half-a-thousand small nails for same, 8d. Pack thread, 3d.; and for one man working on the aforesaid organ, by agreement, 3s. 4d.; and in drink given to the said man, 2d.'

The present organ was built by Lewis in 1878 at a cost of £4,000. Additions, re-voicings, and the fitting of tubular-pneumatic action, were carried out by Messrs. Hill & Son in 1902. More recently, the blowing apparatus having become obsolete and intolerably noisy, and other defects appearing, the organ has been restored, enlarged, and entirely re-voiced by Messrs. Harrison & Harrison, to a specification drawn up by Mr. Moody. The completion of these restorations has been the occasion of the publication of this booklet. The information provided includes the new specification and annotated programmes of the inaugural recitals by Mr. Moody, Mr. Perkins, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, Dr. W. Prendergast, Dr. Varley Roberts, Mr. W. Ellis, and Mr. H. A. Fricker.

By permission of the Dean, Brahms's 'German Requiem' (with full orchestral accompaniment) and Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater' will be sung by the Bach Choir, under the conductorship of Dr. Hugh P. Allen, in Westminster Abbey on Tuesday evening, May 6, at 8 o'clock. The soloists will be Miss Gertrude Sichel and Mr. Frederick Ranalow, and Dr. W. G. Alcock will be at the organ. Admission will be by ticket, to be obtained through members of the Bach Choir only, and not from the Abbey authorities.

The occasion of Mr. Tertius Noble's departure to take up his duties in New York was celebrated at York on April 14 by a large gathering of his friends. An address was read and a purse of money presented to him.

Sir John Stainer's 'Crucifixion' was sung on Good Friday evening at the British Embassy Church, Rue d'Aguesseau, Paris, before a congregation of about 800 people. Mr. R. Plamondon (of the Opéra) was responsible for the tenor solos, which he sang with great taste and feeling, as did also Mr. Ernest Laycock, those attributed to the bass. The conductor was Mr. Percy J. Vincent (organist and choirmaster of the church), and Mr. Leonard J. Parsons presided at the organ.

At the request of the chaplain (Rev. J. B. S. Watson), the Brixton Oratorio Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Douglas Redman, gave the following selections from the 'Messiah' at Brixton Prison on Good Friday. Choruses: 'And the glory of the Lord'; 'For unto us a Child is born'; 'Surely He hath borne our griefs'; 'Worthy is the Lamb that was slain'; 'Amen' Chorus. The solos were sung by Miss Beach, Miss Marion Battishill, and Mr. Robert Pitt. There was a string quartet, with Mr. Welton Hickin at the organ. It is now some years since this Choir first visited Brixton Prison to sing to the prisoners, who greatly appreciate the music, listening very intently. The Rev. J. B. S. Watson spoke in appreciative terms of the good influence of first-rate music on the prisoners, and the interest it afforded also to the warders.

Under the direction of Mr. R. H. Turner, the musical services at Portsmouth Parish Church are still a feature of attraction. The list for April included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major, and other organ solos, while of the vocal numbers the following may be mentioned—Tenor solo, 'God breaketh the battle,' from Parry's 'Judith,' Gounod's 'The Holy Temple,' and Wesley's 'Blessed be the God and Father.'

The annual series of six Lenten organ recitals given by Mr. Lynnwood Farnam at Christ Church Cathedral, Montreal, concluded on March 15 with a Bach recital, at which Bach's Concerto for four pianofortes was performed, the orchestral part being played on the organ. At the close of this recital the Concerto was repeated, when nearly the whole audience availed themselves of the privilege of hearing the work a second time. The collection at this recital exceeded that of any other of the series by £6. The full programme was as follows:—

Short Prelude and Fugue in C major.
Toccata and Fugue in D (Dorian).
Choral Preludes—"In deepest need."
"In Thee is joy."
"We believe all in one God."
Concerto in A minor for four pianofortes.

On Palm Sunday afternoon Maunders' cantata, 'Olivet to Calvary,' was sung in the Baptist Chapel, Quorn. The soloists were Mr. W. Oliver, of Nottingham, and Mr. T. W. Patrick, of Leicester, who with the choir combined in giving a most effective performance of this popular work. Mr. H. H. North was at the organ.

A recital given by Mr. Lemare at Freiburg, whither he went for the purpose of making records on the new Welte Philharmonic organ, aroused great interest and earned enthusiastic notices in the Press.

An excellent performance of the abridged arrangement of Handel's 'Passion of Christ' was given in Cheam Church under the direction of the Rector, the Rev. H. A. Wansbrough, on Wednesday in Holy Week. The accompaniments were provided by an orchestra, pianoforte (Mrs. Marian Young), and organ (Miss Detmar). The choral numbers were well sung by the choir of the Church and the Cheam Choral Society—fifty voices in all. The chorus 'Blessed Jesu,' adapted from Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' formed a suitable prelude to the Passion music.

On March 19 Maunder's 'Penitence, Pardon, and Peace' was sung at St. Edward's Parish Church, Romford. The soloists were Master Stanley Hall, Messrs. F. P. Hammond, and H. A. Young. Mr. A. C. Chappell-Haverson was the organist.

Harold Moore's 'The Darkest Hour' was excellently performed at St. Mary's, Rushden, on Palm Sunday and Good Friday, under the direction of Mr. J. Enos Smith.

Maunder's 'Olivet to Calvary' was given at St. Paul's Church, Lock Haven, Pennsylvania, on March 21. Mr. Frederick Richens was the conductor, and Miss Edna Fredericks accompanied at the organ.

Harold Moore's cantata, 'The Darkest Hour,' was given on Good Friday at St. Luke's Church, Slyné, Lancaster, under the direction of Mr. W. Dennett Davies. The soloists were Master Albert Westwood and Messrs. Johnson, Dennett Davies, Sargeant, Brighton, and Brack, all of whom acquitted themselves well. The choir gave evidence of careful training. Mr. Thomas A. Beckett was at the organ.

A devotional service was held in the Wesleyan Church, Belper, on Good Friday, when Maunder's sacred cantata 'From Olivet to Calvary' was sung by the choir, numbering fifty voices. The soloists were Miss D. Cutts and Messrs. G. H. Westwood and W. Harold Beeson. Mr. James Varney was at the organ, and Mr. John B. Gough conducted.

'The Messiah' (Part 2) was given in Chigwell Church on Good Friday afternoon to a very crowded congregation. The soloists were Madame Windsor Locke, Madame Grace Day Winter, Mr. Herbert Clinch, and Mr. Claude Dyer. The choir was augmented by the Ladies' Choir, and a contingent of the Loughton Choral Society. Mr. Henry Riding conducted, and Mr. E. Cuthbert Nunn was the organist.

Sterndale Bennett's sacred cantata 'The Woman of Samaria' was sung at a special service of praise on Easter Tuesday in the Clark Memorial Church, Largs; the soloists were Miss Mary Johnson, Miss Jean Morris, Mr. J. Rae, and Mr. W. T. Malcom. Mr. W. H. Stocks presided at the organ.

Brahms's 'Requiem' was performed by Abbotshall Parish Church choir, Kirkcaldy, on Sunday, March 30, and again by request on Sunday, April 13, with Mr. Herbert Westerby at the organ. The church was crowded on each occasion.

The Choral Society at St. Bartholomew's, Dalston, gave a very successful performance of selections from Handel's 'Messiah,' before a large congregation, on April 7. The soloists were Miss Lilian Turnbull, Miss Katie Daley, Mr. Richard Bruhl, and Mr. Harry Long. Mr. Clement Meek, organist and choirmaster at the church, conducted, and Mr. F. W. Bradley accompanied at the organ.

A most creditable performance of Gaul's sacred cantata, 'Ruth,' was given at the Church of Christ, Birkenhead, on April 10, under the able conductorship of Mr. J. H. Manley, choirmaster.

At St. Pancras Church, on April 13, a memorial tablet to Henry Smart, formerly organist to the church, was dedicated.

The choir of Lindley Church, Huddersfield, recently gave an excellent performance of Gounod's 'The Redemption.' Mr. Haydn H. Sandwell (organist and choirmaster), accompanied at the organ, and Mr. G. R. Swindon supplied the percussion. The work was performed without conductor.

The quarterly meeting of the Huddersfield and District Organists' Association was held in the Parochial Hall on April 18, when the Rev. S. Swire read a paper on 'Music in church worship, from a parson's point of view.' The Association, which numbers seventy-five members, will visit Beverley for the annual summer outing.

The Barless Psalter. Edited by the Rev. Walter Marshall and Seymour Pile.

Of the making of many Psalters there is apparently no end. But we have without much weariness to the flesh perused the pages before us, and while we cannot agree with all that is claimed by the editors as being advantageous, we readily admit that they have done much to simplify pointing, both from the congregational aspect and from that of the choir. It is rightly contended that the basis of all pointing should be good and therefore deliberate reading, and in many ways this Psalter will encourage these desirable attributes. It will astonish those opening the book to find no bar lines, asterisks, so-called accents, &c., the sole direction-marks consisting of one wavy line in each half-verse and a word or syllable in italics. There is also a small accent now and then to show the division of such words as 'loved'; else all is simple. The Preface fully explains the views of the editors, and any choir-master should be able by these means to place clearly before the choir the principles laid down. Though the 'Barless Psalter' undoubtedly makes for simplicity, we are of opinion that finality has not yet been reached. Might not something be done by concerted action, and the formation of a working committee? The Cathedral Psalter appeared only after such consideration, and even then it was decided to publish more than one system. It often happens that far too little attention is given to the diligent practice of Psalm pointing, and it is a question whether it is worth while further simplifying the Psalter. Surely no one can object to such pointing as can be heard at St. Paul's Cathedral; St. George's Chapel, Windsor; Magdalen College, Oxford; or the Temple Church, &c., where the barred Psalter in some form is used. We do not wish to detract from the excellent work accomplished by the editors of the 'Barless Psalter,' our object being to compress all that is good into one common volume which shall appeal to all who realise the beauty of these songs of the Church.

[Paris: Librairie Felix Alcan.]

We extend a cordial welcome to the second year's publication of L'Année Musicale, which runs to 311 pages, large 8vo. The first portion of the volume contains four papers of permanent value by MM. Collet, de la Laurencie, Cucuel, and Prunières, of which those on 'Spanish Musical Theorists of the 16th century' and 'Jean de Cambefort' will doubtless prove of exceptional interest to musicologists. M. Jean Chantavoine contributes an excellent bird's-eye view of French music in 1912.

Of the signed notices of musical works published in 1911 and 1912, Michel Brenet is responsible for quite a dozen reviews, in all of which his critical faculty is admirably displayed. He highly praises Sir Hubert Parry's 'Style in Musical Art,' and he has also an appreciative review of Dr. Gratton Flood's 'Story of the Bagpipe.' M.-D. Calvocoressi contributes five reviews on Russian music. Other reviewers are Georges Cucuel and de la Laurencie. The latter describes Kinkeldey's 'Orgel und Klavier in der Musik des 16. Jahrhunderts' as 'without doubt one of the most remarkable contributions to ancient music that has appeared in recent years'; and he bestows lavish praise on de Wyzewa's and Saint Foix's 'Mozart.' In his notice of Mr. A. H. Littleton's privately-printed 'Catalogue of one hundred works illustrating the history of Music-printing from the 15th to the end of the 17th century,' M. Brenet pays tribute to the printing and get-up of the work, by Novello & Co., adding: 'L'élégante exécution typographique de ce catalogue est digne des bibliophiles auxquels il s'adresse.'

Antiphonale Vaticanum SS.D.N. Pii X Pontificis Maximi jussu restitutum editum. 1143 pp. 1913.

[Rome: Vatican Press.]

This new Vatican edition of the 'Antiphonale' or Antiphoner, contains all the chants of the Divine Office for Vespers and Compline, as revised by the Pontifical Commission. For most Roman Catholic churches an epitome of the work entitled 'Vesperale' is all that is necessary, namely, the Offices of Vespers and Compline for all the feasts of the year. Already a number of publishers announce editions of the 'Vesperale' conformable to the chants given in the Vatican 'Antiphonale,' and in accordance with the Papal decree all such editions must be strictly in conformity with that issued by the Vatican Press. There are many notable changes in the 'Antiphonale' both in text and music, and it may be said that these changes are all for the better. The guiding hands of the Solesmes Benedictines are visible throughout. It is almost unnecessary to add that the printing of the volume is worthy of the Vatican Press.

Score Reading Exercises for the Examinations of the Royal College of Organists. Written, selected, and arranged by H. A. Harding, Mus. D. Oxon.

[Weekes & Co.]

These excellent volumes, coming with such authority, can be recommended to those purposing to sit for the R.C.O. diplomas, as among the very best we have yet seen. The exercises for Associateship are the original work of Dr. Harding, while for the Fellowship he has made a wide and varied choice from the works of Palestrina, Vittoria, Bach, and similar contrapuntal schools. We are confident that any candidate who can play readily the exercises in either volume may walk with confidence, so far as score-reading is concerned, into the Kensington Gore 'den of lions.' We congratulate Dr. Harding on his work, and feel sure that it will be widely used, as it certainly deserves to be.

Across the door; A cradle song; A drover; The Rachray man; The stranger's grave. By Hamilton Harty.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This collection contains some of the best song-writing of the modern British school. The words (by Padraic Colum in the first three examples, by Moira O'Neill and Emily Lawless in the others) show us Irish scenes with a background of grim nature and grim humanity, and it is in heightening this suggestion that Mr. Harty's music finds its chief distinction. The vocal line is expressive and well-poised, and the accompaniments have a fine ruggedness and individuality. There is a striking pictorial suggestiveness about 'Across the door'; without catching a word of the text one is aware of dancing Irish peasantry, the sound of their music becoming more remote as the lovers steal away to solitude, and the love-glamour and mystery of the dim-lit meadows. The 'Cradle song' is a lullaby of death, with a low note of resignation. In 'A drover' one can feel the sturdy gait, harsh character and wild freedom of mind of the man who speaks; it is a song of high forcefulness, imagination, and technical skill, and we look forward to hearing it interpreted by a baritone singer of dramatic power, with the composer as accompanist. 'The Rachray man' shows the desperation of a mainland girl who has hastily promised herself to a son of the island where there's 'fishin' and fightin' an' tearin' away, and no Christianity. The Irish idiom runs bravely through both words and music. 'The stranger's grave,' set to a poem inspired by a 'graveyard upon Inishmaan, dedicated to unbaptized babies, where an unknown drowned man lies buried,' introduces a different atmosphere—one of pathos and mystery, with some poignancy. In all the songs great thought is bestowed upon the accompaniment, which plays an important share in the suggestion of mood and in the making of musical interest. The collection heightens our respect for Mr. Harty's power of invention and musical expression.

Four Songs. For low voice; By Natrass Gill. For high voice; To my mother. For low voice. By Charles Kennedy Scott.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

To secure atmosphere is the principal aim and the principal achievement of Mr. Kennedy Scott's work as a song writer. The words by Beatrice E. Bulman that supply the texts of all the songs mentioned above, often prompt an atmospheric setting, and Mr. Scott's task has clearly been congenial. He has not only found the right suggestiveness but has conveyed it in terms that rise here and there to high musical beauty. 'Shadows' and 'Stella' (from the 'Four songs') are examples of this type. Where more direct expressiveness prevails, as in 'If thoughts had wings' (from the 'Four songs') Mr. Scott's ideas are equally individual and their musical quality is good. These new issues, and the songs by Mr. Scott that we reviewed in a previous issue, show that he has acquired a personal style that can be recognized.

Original Compositions for the Organ (New Series):—Jour de Noces (No. 6), by J. Stuart Archer; Postludium (No. 5), by William Faulkes; A Fantasy (No. 6), by C. Edgar Ford.

Though a trifle in dimensions, Mr. Archer's piece contains very charming and finished writing. We doubt the wisdom of using the tremulant on the Swell simultaneously with the superoctave coupler, as the higher register under such conditions usually sounds grotesque. But the piece is well worth playing.

Mr. Faulkes's work is always interesting, and written with unerring instinct for organ resources and effect. His 'Postludium' contains much that is effective both contrapuntally and with regard to harmonic progression.

Dr. Ford's 'Fantasy' is a charming addition to the lighter side, and without venturing too near the border-line exhibits much that is attractive. Many fanciful points are developed and help to maintain interest, while the suggested registering should be possible on the average organ.

The Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis. In B flat major. By John E. West.

This is a bright, attractive, well-written setting of the Evening Canticles, and within the capacity of the average choir. Any of Mr. West's works may be relied upon to reveal the hand of experience in all that makes for dignity and legitimate effect, whether in the vocal portions or the organ part, and his latest effort is fully up to the average we have learned to expect of him.

THE 'PASSION' CHORALE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—When Mr. Newman confronted me with extracts from the writings of four leading Bach scholars I decided to let the matter rest, for although I knew I was right I felt that living over a hundred miles from the British Museum I was badly placed for a controversy. Now that Mr. Henry Davey has taken the matter up I may perhaps be allowed to add one more word. Though not a German myself I was brought up in a German-speaking town, where my father, a Dean, was for nearly half-a-century the incumbent of an old abbey church. Thus for many years much of my time was spent in the choir and the organ loft. I am therefore well acquainted, both theoretically and practically, with the German chorales. In the hymnal in use in the said church only three hymns were set to the tune under consideration, viz., 'O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden,' 'Wie soll ich Dich empfangen,' and 'Befehl du deine Wege.' The first of these was sung regularly, but not exclusively, during Holy Week, and occasionally at Communion service; the second during Advent and on Palm Sunday, and the third, being purely devotional, was sung very frequently throughout the year, on all possible occasions, not excluding weddings and burials. If, therefore, the tune evoked any associations they had reference to the last-named hymn and not to the others. Of course this refers to the second half of the 19th century, not to the first half of the 18th, but knowing that at this earlier period the same tune was used in connection with many more hymns—nearly thirty, says Mr. Davey—and some of them extremely popular, such as 'Nun ruhen alle Wälder,' I was quite certain of the correctness of my contention, and am grateful for the confirmation it has received unexpectedly.—I am, Sir, yours truly, Z.

SIR,—This discussion is becoming a trifle comic. Neither Mr. Henry Davey's scholarly and accurate letter nor the second letter of 'Z.' throws any light on the real point that is puzzling us all, which is—When is a German not a German? I have already said I was well aware that not only the so-called 'Passion Hymn' but the melodies of other chorales were and are sung to more than one set of words. The main question is, was I right or wrong in assuming that the melody of 'O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden' carried what may be called a Passion significance to the minds of those who first heard the 'Christmas Oratorio.' 'Z.'s first contention was that this idea is wholly due to the melody of the chorale being associated in the English mind with the Passion Hymn, and that 'to the German mind it conveys no particular association.' In reply I quoted passages from the works of four German writers upon music—Spitta, Schering, Schweitzer, and Wolfrum—all of them well versed in the music of the church, that put it beyond doubt that to them, at any rate, it did convey this particular association; and it is hardly likely that they are the only people in Germany who have ever been of that way of thinking. This evidence 'Z.' does not attempt to meet. He simply says that he 'knew he was right.' Well, I might say I knew I was wrong; but I should never allow a purely private consideration of that kind to stand in the way of argument upon a matter of grave public concern. I submit that the evidence is conclusive enough that however right 'Z.' may be with regard to the general use of the tune—and in this I would not dream of contradicting him—he cannot possibly be right in saying that 'the German mind' would repudiate the association of the melody with the 'Passion Hymn.' Even Mr. Davey tacitly admits my contention in the act of overtly denying it—denying, indeed, more than I ever said. 'One must regret,' he writes, 'that Spitta and others have given currency to the fancy that some allusion to the "St. Matthew Passion" was understood in the "Christmas Oratorio."' So much as that has not been alleged by anyone, so far as I know. What Spitta and others say is that the melody in question suggests Christ's Passion in general, not Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion.' But whichever way Mr. Davey puts it, it remains evident that 'Spitta and others' have indulged in this 'fancy' time after time. But why, if such a 'fancy' is, as 'Z.' will have it, alien to the 'German mind'? It is to this that I respectfully invite 'Z.'s' further attention. I myself am hardly concerned in the matter at all. I am glad to drop out of the firing line, and leave 'Z.' to settle things with Spitta, Wolfrum & Co. It seems to me that he must either modify his statement that the melody in question 'conveys no particular association' to the 'German mind,' or deny that Spitta, Schweitzer, Wolfrum, and Schering are Germans. He surely cannot have it both ways.

SIR,—The argument as to the analogy existing between organ and orchestra may be easily pushed too far: at the same time, I venture to think that it scarcely supports Mr. Burns's contention. The term 'scale,' indeed, indicating the proportion between the length and diameter of a pipe, is inapplicable to a stringed instrument; and I am not sure whether, in employing it, Mr. Burns refers to the cubic contents of the resonance chamber, or to the proportion of depth to length. But with organ pipes, scale does not increase with descent in pitch; on the contrary, it diminishes. Similarly, the violin is larger in proportion than the viola, and the 'cello is larger in proportion than the double-bass. A given sound is more powerful on the 'cello than on the double-bass. This is the reason why the upper strings of the double-bass viol were gradually abandoned. 'The viol double-bass has survived. . . . partly because from this instrument a penetrating, rather than powerful, tone is required.' (E. J. Payne in 'Grove,' sub-article 'Violin.') Mr. Hope-Jones used to complain of the deficiency of power in the deep bass of the orchestra, as compared with that of the organ. The effect of assimilating the model of the back to that of the belly (one of the principal points of difference between the double-bass and the rest of the strings), is to double the tone.

The allusion to Smart's 'Festal March in D' was quite by the way; but if Mr. Burns finds it 'easily possible to realise the composer's exact intentions' on a three-decker, he must not only possess a tuba mirabilis on a manual other than the Great, but also a tromba; which latter must be enclosed in a box, and available in instantaneous alternation with Great soft 8-ft. coupled to Swell reed in unison and octave, accompanied by Choir soft 8-ft. and 4-ft. Such an instrument is unusual.—Yours faithfully,

WAGNER AND SUPER-WAGNER.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—It is all your fault: I asked you not to print my letter unless you were sure that Mr. Newman would take it in the spirit in which it was written, and you assured me it would be all right. Now see what your fatal optimism has let me in for! This great man is offended with me, and is so terrible in his wrath that nothing remains but to propitiate him by abjuring all my errors and declaring that there is no god but Schönberg and Ernest Newman is his prophet.

Seriously, Mr. Newman writes an article upon a purely speculative matter, to which I happen to have devoted much thought for nearly half-a-century. If I in all courtesy dissent from his views, why need he get so angry? A critic should surely set us an example of how to behave under criticism, and not, cuttlefish-like, emit under irritation an inky flood of irrelevancy. In his letter he conjures up nearly thirty purely imaginary bogies under my name, and to this I have no objection—it all makes for popularity!

For the rest, if Mr. Newman knew anything at all about me (I am a composer, he may be surprised to know), I hardly think he would have written his letter; 'but,' as Mr. Toots argued with Captain Cuttle, 'you never can know me, Captain Gills, unless you give me the pleasure of your acquaintance.'—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

THEATRE MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Will you allow me to raise an emphatic protest against the contention of your contributor, Walter Weaver-Yeomans (in your April number), that the indifference shown by the playgoer to theatre music is the primary cause of its decay?

The playgoer is right in being indifferent to irrelevant incidental music because such music is only to be regarded as an incubus; but the attitude toward special incidental music must largely depend upon the circumstances in which it is performed.

For some entirely unfathomable reason, the managers of theatres, who provide good orchestras under capable conductors for the performance of special music, do not pay the slightest heed to the comforts of the would-be listener, and instead of closing the doors and instructing their attendants to discountenance every kind of disturbance, and making an attempt to suppress interference with a proper appreciation of the music, they do everything in their power to make one believe that they would be very pleased to be rid of the band—even when legitimately employed.

I have quite recently attended plays for which special music had been composed, and on these occasions the numbers which were not actually a commentary upon the dramatic action, might for the most part just as well not have been played for all the chance they were given of being comfortably listened to. At properly conducted concerts it is customary to regard persons who enter the hall during the performance, or otherwise contribute to the audience's distraction, as ill-bred. If theatre managers were to show their respect for legitimate music, and at the same time their disrespect (by a practical and complete indifference) for flippant and irrelevant music, we should soon arrive, I venture to think, at a reasonable behaviour on the part of audiences.—I am, Sir, obediently yours,

M. MONTAGU-NATHAN.

26, Hereford Square,
London, S.W.

ORGAN WIND-PRESSURES.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Referring to Mr. Blake's letter in your issue for March, in which he quotes the fine Hill organ at St. Stephen's, Walbrook, as being on low pressure throughout, I should like to mention that I have a specification issued after the 1907 rebuild, in which Mr. H. J. White inserted 'Great Tromba on 7 inches of wind.' The Choir Organ and Pedal flues are on 3 inches, Great flues and Pedal reeds on 3½, and the Swell organ on 4½. Of course these pressures are comparatively light, but the absence from the printed specification of any mention of 7 inches for the Tromba is misleading.

Mr. Blake's remarks on the Hamburg organ are most interesting.—Yours faithfully,

DONALD W. H. PENROSE.

FRANCIS KORBAY.

We regret to announce the following deaths :

In our last issue we announced briefly the death, on March 9, of FRANCIS KORBAY, the well-known Hungarian musician, who so closely identified himself with music in England by his long residence in this country. He was born in Buda-Pest in 1846. His father was a landowner and his mother was a descendant of the poet, Stephen Gyöngéjös. His father joined the revolutionary party, and suffered imprisonment and the forfeiture of his estates. The youth turned his attention to music, and at nineteen found himself in the possession of a robust tenor voice, and he soon afterwards appeared in Grand Opera in Hungary. But the strain was too great, and eventually he abandoned this career and applied himself to pianoforte study under Franz Liszt. He came to London in 1871, but finding insufficient support, he went to New York and toured in the United States with the tenor, Wachtel. He became intimate with Rubinstein and Bülow, and ultimately established himself in New York as a professor of singing. Madame Susan Strong and the late Mrs. Henschel were amongst his pupils. In 1874 he came to London, and soon established a teaching connection. In 1894 he became a professor at the Royal Academy of Music, and remained in that position until 1903.

He is however chiefly celebrated here and abroad for his fine songs, amongst which 'Mohacs Field' may be mentioned specially. He was a devoted nationalist, and all his music is suffused with Hungarian idioms. A 'Hungarian' Overture was recently performed at the Queen's Hall.

By the kind permission of M. de Lazlo and of Mr. Rathbone (the executor of the estate), we are glad to be able to give a striking portrait of the late musician. It is necessary to explain that the costume is the ordinary dress of a Hungarian noble, used for ceremonial occasions, which Korbay and his family were entitled to wear.

JOHN SKELTON BUMPUS, on April 10. He was born in London on August 6, 1861. He and his brother Thomas F. Bumpus (who is still living) for years have become identified with the architecture of Cathedral and other churches at home and abroad. The deceased also specialised in ecclesiastical music and its literature, and was regarded as a distinguished expert on these subjects. He was honorary librarian at St. Michael's College, Tenbury. His most important contributions to history include 'A History of English Cathedral Music,' a great and extremely valuable 'Dictionary of Ecclesiological Terms,' and 'The organists and composers of St. Paul's Cathedral.' The funeral took place on April 15. A burial service was held at St. Matthias Church, Stoke Newington. A quartet of singers—Messrs. Marriott, Morgan, Stubbs, and Vernon Taylor, from St. Paul's Cathedral—sang, and Mr. F. T. Kennard, the organist of the church, played. The interment took place at New Southgate Cemetery. There were numerous floral tributes. Sir George Martin, Dr. A. H. Mann, and Mr. John E. West were among those present.

The late Mr. Bumpus attached himself very closely to a large circle of friends, many of whom feel his loss acutely.

D. EMLYN EVANS, the well-known Welsh composer and critic, at the age of sixty-nine. For the last thirty or forty years of his life he was held in universal respect for his musical knowledge and insight, and for his whole-hearted devotion to the cause of Welsh music, which he always endeavoured to lead towards artistic and progressive ideals. As a composer he won his first success at the Eisteddfod of 1863. In all, he won seventy Eisteddfod prizes. His numerous writings include cantatas, anthems, and part-songs, and he arranged and edited the five hundred Welsh airs in the collection of Mr. Nicholas Bennett. As a musical critic, his knowledge and acuteness of vision placed him in the premier place among his countrymen. Many will miss his inspiring guidance and vivacious personality.

JOHN THOMAS, on March 19. He was one of the most celebrated harpists that Wales has produced. Born at Bridgend, Glamorganshire, on March 1, 1826, he soon exhibited musical talent, and was said to be able to play the piccolo when only four years of age. When he was fourteen he entered the Royal Academy of Music, and studied the harp under J. B. Chatterton. In 1872 he was appointed harpist to Queen Victoria. He was a professor of the harp at the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College. In recognition of his services to Wales he was presented in 1886 with a purse of 500 guineas. He received many academic honours during his long and useful life.

MR. BARTON MCGUCKIN, a tenor singer of high standing. He was born in 1853, at Dublin, became a choir-boy at Armagh Cathedral, and afterwards principal tenor at St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. For many years he was a leading member of the Carl Rosa Opera Company, and among his achievements in this sphere were the first interpretations in England of the parts of Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. In his last years he devoted himself to teaching.

MR. HENRY GRIMSHAW, organist of the principal Unitarian Church, Ullet Road, Liverpool, who died suddenly on April 2. Mr. Grimshaw, who came to Liverpool from Yorkshire many years ago, held a recognised position among local teachers, and had frequently deputised for Mr. Best at St. George's Hall.

MR. CLIFTON BINGHAM, at Bristol, on March 25, at the age of fifty-four. He was the writer of innumerable lyrics that have been set by British song composers. For some years he acted as dramatic and musical critic for various papers. He lived in London for many years, but recently, until his death, he resided at his native city of Bristol.

WILLIAM JOHN FITZSIMMON, on March 14, at the age of sixty-six. He was for thirty-four years the editor of Musical Opinion, which Journal he and his brother started in 1877. He retired from active control about eighteen months ago.

MR. F. NORRIS, lay-clerk at Christ Church, Oxford. He was chiefly known and respected for his connection with the Woodstock Deanery Choir Festivals, which he conducted no fewer than forty times.

DVORÁK'S 'STABAT MATER.'

Any instructions or hints given by a composer respecting the manner in which he wishes his work to be performed are of special interest and importance. I venture, therefore, to think that the following brief notes respecting the tempi of various movements and passages in Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' may be of service to conductors when producing that work. The directions and modifications mentioned below were given by Dvorák to the late Prof. Ebenezer Prout at the Worcester Festival in 1884, shortly after the publication of the work, and were marked in his copy of the score. They are as follows:—

No. 1.—The opening Andante con moto is marked in the Novello edition M.M. $\text{♩} = 76$; this was altered by

* The references are to the pages of the pianoforte and vocal score published by Messrs. Novello.

Dvorák to '63.' The passage which begins at the words 'Dolorosa juxta,' two bars from the end of p. 5, is marked Poco accelerando up to the 7th bar on p. 6, which is marked Tempo 1mo. This phrase is repeated three times in the movement, and is so marked on each recurrence.

No. 2, Quartet (p. 26).—This is marked in Novello's edition M.M. $\text{♩} = 63$: Dvorák directed that it be taken 'rather slower,' and that a decidedly long pause be made at bar 6 of the introductory symphony. Later on in this movement, at the words 'Dum emit Spiritum' for the basses (p. 32, bar 7), we find a Poco accelerando marked, the Tempo 1mo being resumed at bars 12, 13. At the words 'Matrem Christi si videret' (last two notes of the last bar on p. 34), we have an accelerando continuing to the end of the solo passage for the basses (p. 35, bar 10). In the concluding symphony to this movement, the bass phrase beginning at bar 8 of p. 37 is to be taken Poco accelerando, the last eight bars of the movement being marked rallentando.

No. 3, Chorus.—The concluding eight bars (p. 45) are marked Poco a poco rall. ad fine.

No. 4, 'Fac ut ardeat.'—At the change of key on p. 50 there is an accelerando marked for two bars, followed by two bars rallentando; then follow five bars of symphony, beginning at bar 4, p. 51, marked Tempo 1mo. The tempo of the bass solo which follows (Poco più mosso) is indicated as '♩ = 100 about.'

No. 5, Chorus.—The metronome mark ♩ = 42 is altered to '48,' whilst later on at Un poco più mosso (p. 57, bar 6), '60' is substituted for the '56' of Novello's edition. The last eight bars of the number (p. 61) are marked Poco ritardando.

No. 6, 'Fac me vere.'—The tenor solo at Poco più mosso (p. 65, bar 5), is marked '♩ = 92.'

No. 7, 'Virgo virginum præclara.'—At the words 'Fac me tecum,' sung by the sopranos in unison with the violins (p. 75, bar 3), Dvorák gives the direction Pochettino accelerando, and at 'Mihi jam non sis amara' (on the last line of p. 75), Poco rallentando.

No. 8, Duet.—The metronome mark ♩ = 104 is altered to '76'; the soprano phrase on p. 80, bar 12, being marked Poco accelerando for eight bars; then the Tempo 1mo is resumed.

No. 10, 'Quando Corpus.'—The passage sung by the choir without accompaniment (p. 101, last line) is marked Poco più lento, as also is the solo violin passage on the last line of p. 102.

H. MACAULAY FITZGIBBON.

BANTOCK'S 'ATALANTA IN CALYDON' AT SHEFFIELD.

Sheffield and Leeds choral forces collaborated in the first performance in Sheffield of Prof. Bantock's experimental 'choral symphony' 'Atalanta in Calydon.' With the great choir of the Sheffield Musical Union, supplemented by a large contingent from the Leeds Choral Union, there was organized a huge executive body such as the diffused laying out of the voice-parts in the work demands. Repeated hearings of 'Atalanta' add to the conviction that the composer understated his requirements when he fixed ten voices to a part (that is, a choir of 200) as the irreducible minimum. The figure should have been doubled.

The outstanding feature of the performance, which was directed by Dr. Coward, was the element of self-reliance which seemed to permeate all divisions of the choir. It manifested itself in superb attack on the lines and blocks of choral tone which the composer has imposed one upon another with such overwhelming effect, and in the seizing with sure chording of the changing tonalities, often unrelated, or treacherously chromatic; and, further, the almost unflinching maintenance of the pitch. There was, too, a greater observance of dictional suggestiveness than has been heard by the writer in four previous performances. Dr. Coward had evidently realised, as do all conductors, that the most difficult section of the work to interpret with constant interest is the first, for male voices, depicting the coming of Spring. He made it full of vitality, but of the unflagging rather than of the cumulative kind. Climaxes there were in plenty, but they were not so well engineered as in the closing Ode, where there was exhibited an envisaged completeness of plan which the other movements lacked. There was great splendour of tone in all divisions of the choir, and when the choral tutti was utilised the effect was supremely grand, as all who know Dr. Coward's choirs and their whole-hearted outpouring of tone can well imagine. On that side the performance was probably unsurpassable by any existing choir. Had the poetic conceptions and 'atmosphere' of the performance equalled its executive completeness, it would have ranked as the most nearly ideal realisation of the composer's daring experiment. But until the needed special choir is organized, with every voice selected, classified, and trained, and tinted to the exact needs of its particular part, 'Atalanta' will never come into its own. The performance was repeated later in the same concert, with some falling off in the pitch and general excellence, though the second Ode (for ladies' voices) showed an improvement. Mr. Frederick Dawson and Mr. Alfred Barker played respectively pianoforte and violin solos, and the concert ended with Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' the orchestral parts being played on the organ by Mr. W. S. Jessop.

London Concerts.

MR. BALFOUR GARDINER'S CONCERTS, QUEEN'S HALL.

The programme of the last concert of this series, which took place on March 18, was of unusual interest. Bantock's Birmingham Festival orchestral work 'Fifine at the Fair' received its first London performance. It was remarkably well played under Mr. Gardiner's direction, and made a strong impression. The brilliant and picturesque orchestration, calling in places for virtuoso skill, and its dramatic characterization of the three personages in Browning's somewhat enigmatic poem, places the work as one of the finest of the composer's compositions. Another important item was Mr. Frederic Austin's new Symphony in E. This is a serious and earnestly-written work, and its plan is the outcome of a set purpose which was explained at some length in the programme-book by Mr. Austin. As we hope shortly to deal with Mr. Austin's ideas and their exemplification in his Symphony more fully than is possible in this notice, it must suffice to say that while the unconventionality of the construction of the work provided some problems for the listener, it was obvious that the composer had much to say of great interest, and that some of the music made a strong appeal on the ground of its power and beauty. At this hearing the orchestration seemed too continuously thick, but it displayed considerable command of colour. The programme also included an orchestral piece, 'In the faery hills,' by Mr. Arnold Bax, in which this clever composer shows attractive fancifulness, Delius's Pianoforte concerto, admirably played by Miss Evelyn Stuart, and Mr. Gardiner's ever welcome 'Shepherd Fennell's dance.' We trust that Mr. Gardiner will see his way to continue his concert scheme, which so far has done so much for British composers.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

'A tale of Old Japan' and portions of 'Hiawatha' formed the programme of the concert given by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall on April 17. Sir Frederick Bridge directed performances of these works that were exceptionally attractive in expression and sonority. The solo parts were taken by Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

The first performance in England of Wolf-Ferrari's 'La Vita Nuova,' which took place at Queen's Hall on April 9, has further increased our indebtedness to Mr. Arthur Fagge and the London Choral Society. The work is not, however, epoch-making, although it gave the composer his reputation. It is a setting of poems from Dante's 'La Vita Nuova,' but one which does not penetrate deeply. For the greater part it is music of a simple charm, which, while following the changing moods and undercurrents of the poems, follows them at a distance. There is much straightforward melodic-writing, and much interesting colour-effect. The choral music provides many agreeable moments, and the solo parts contain much that is individual. The interpretation given by the London Choral Society, with Miss Carrie Tubb and Mr. Thorpe Bates as soloists, left nothing wanting. It was followed by the Grail Scene from 'Parsifal' in which Mr. William Waite, Mr. Thorpe Bates, and the Farmer Road (Leyton) Council School, took part.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The most noteworthy of the concerts of this series—or of any series—that have taken place recently, was that given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra on April 5, when the choir of the Birmingham Festival came to London and took part in a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony and works of Bach. This choir is the best that Birmingham has produced, and the reputation which preceded it to London was fully sustained by the visit. A more brilliant performance of the Finale to the Symphony has seldom been heard. In Bach's unaccompanied motet 'Be not afraid,' the singers again showed the tone-power, exhilarating attack, and buoyancy, that earned such high praise at the last Birmingham Festival and again at the Festival of the Incorporated Society of Musicians. The choir was also heard in Bach's 'God's time is the best,' with orchestral accompaniment as adapted by Mr. Van der Stucken. The solo parts in the Symphony were sung by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. Herbert Heyner, in a manner that indicated special preparation. Sir Henry Wood conducted with all his mastery, and the occasion was a further tribute to the abilities of Mr. R. H. Wilson, the chorus-master.

At the concluding concert of the season, given on April 19, M. Godowsky formed the centre of attraction. His reading of Brahms's B flat Pianoforte concerto had all the great qualities of brilliance and intellectuality that one expects from him. His playing was fascinating in its certainty and authority, and it was equally fascinating to observe the subtle skill with which Sir Henry Wood and his orchestra accompanied him. The Symphony of the occasion was Beethoven's Seventh, which was interpreted in a manner always well-weighed and interesting. Four dances of Beethoven, as arranged by Herr Steinbach, and Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' completed the programme.

The annual Endowment Fund concert took place on April 12 before a large audience. Lady Speyer and Mr. Mark Hambourg were the soloists, and the purely orchestral numbers in the programme were chosen from Wagner.

THE NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the Tchaikovsky Concert given by this Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction at Queen's Hall on March 29, was as backneyed as any programme could be; but Mr. Ronald's strength lies in awakening fresh interest in romantic works that through familiarity are losing their attraction for musicians. The fifth Symphony is one of his most spirited battle-horses, and he whipped it into high frenzy. The audience, which filled the hall, was enraptured both by this interpretation and by that of the B flat minor Pianoforte concerto given by Mr. Mark Hambourg. The programme opened with the 'Casse-Noisette' Suite.

THE COLONNE ORCHESTRA.

This famous organization (founded in 1874) paid a visit to London in order to give two concerts of French music on April 15 (evening) and April 16 (afternoon), under the direction of its conductor, M. Pierné. The first concert provided little that was unfamiliar either as music or as interpretation. The only novelty was the prelude to M. Pierné's 'La Croisade des Enfants.' The second concert served to introduce to London the 'Rondes de Printemps et Gigue,' by Debussy, and the 'Tableaux Symphoniques,' by M. Ernest Fanelli, the composer whose career was described in our issue for April, 1912.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. George Kitchin, gave a concert at Queen's Hall on April 10. Excellent performances of Humperdinck's 'Hänsel und Gretel' Overture, Haydn's 'Military' Symphony in G, and Berlioz's Hungarian march, gave abundant pleasure to a large audience. The male-voice choir, under Mr. Frank Idle, was responsible for some good glee-singing. The soloist of the occasion was Miss Phyllis Lett.

On April 17, Mr. Joseph Ivimey ably conducted a concert of the Strolling Players' Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall, and provided, amongst other good things, an attractive and extremely efficient performance of Beethoven's eighth Symphony. Solo music was provided by Miss Irene Scharrer (pianist) and Mr. George Baker (vocalist).

The forty-sixth concert of the North London Orchestral Society took place at Queen's Hall on April 18, and under the inspiring and careful guidance of Mr. Lennox Clayton was a decided success. The feature of the evening was a performance of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony. Bach's bass cantata 'Ich will den Kreuzstab' was sung by Mr. Robert Maitland and the Twickenham Philharmonic Society. Miss Winifred Christie (pianist) was the other soloist.

An exceptionally interesting concert was given at Bechstein Hall, on March 31, by Miss Miriam Timothy, the well-known harpist. It differed from the average harp-recital in that the whole programme was of high musical value. Mr. Julius Harrison's new quintet, 'Prelude music' for harp and strings, well displayed both his musicianship in the scoring and his romantic invention. A piece by Ravel for harps, strings, and wood, was characteristic of its composer, as also was Mr. York Bowen's 'Arabesque' for harp solo. The interest of the programme was heightened by a selection of songs sung by Miss Florence Schmidt, included in which were 'A lullaby' by Mr. Eugene Goossens, jun., and 'Farewell,' by Mr. Harrison, both with flute obbligato. The artists assisting Miss Timothy were Mr. Naum Blinder, Miss M. H. Timothy, Mr. Alfred Hobday, and Mr. Patterson Parker (string quartet), Mr. Borlée (flautist), and Mr. Haydn Draper (clarinetist).

Miss Rebe Kussmann (violinist), Miss Marie L. Goulden (pianist), and Miss Barbara Lee (reciter), with Mr. Eric Zardo (pianist), gave a concert at the Guildhall School of Music on March 31, and represented the work of that institution at a high level.—Excellent performances of Gump's 'Merrie England' were given by a company of pupils, under the instruction of Mr. Cairns James and Mr. B. Soutten, on April 4 and 5, at the School.

Considerable interest attached to a concert of songs by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, given at Bechstein Hall on April 1, inasmuch as the whole programme was given in new English versions prepared by Mr. Hermann Klein and Mr. Emil Kreuz. These gentlemen have tackled their difficult task with high ability, and they have approached as near to the unattainable ideal as is possible. The artists who took part were Madame Jomelli, Madame Emily Thornfield, Miss Helen Blain, Mr. Gwynne Davies, Mr. Laurence Brydall, and Mr. Harold Berresford.

Pupils of Trinity College of Music gave an orchestral concert of considerable interest at Queen's Hall on April 4, and carried out a varied programme with well-trained ability under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Sachse. The artists who contributed individually were Miss Edna Purdie, Miss Margaret Gibson, Miss Hazel Giles, Mr. George Shrive, Miss Alice Lees, Mr. Edward Mitchell, Mr. Clarice Mills, Mr. William Bowyer, and Miss Edith Hillard.

RECITALS.

The vocal recital given by Mr. Cecil Fanning at Bechstein Hall on April 8, proved him the possessor of considerable natural gifts and musical ability. Miss Winifred Barnes, a soprano singer, who in conjunction with her teacher, Mr. Hugo Heinz, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on the evening of the same day, is also a well-equipped artist.

Two youthful musicians, Mr. Leo Livens and Miss Evangeline Livens, who are students of composition and the pianoforte at the Royal Academy of Music, showed their powers at the Goupil Gallery on April 10, the concert being arranged by Mrs. W. S. Marchant. Both displayed considerable talent.

Compositions by Mr. Cyril Scott formed the programme of a recital given at Bechstein Hall on April 16. The new examples threw no new light on his powers, but the music as a whole was a further tribute to his known individuality and imagination. The exponents were Miss Jean Waterston and Mr. Hubert Eisdell (vocalists) and the composer (solo-pianist and accompanist).

Mr. Richard Levitt, in giving a recital of his own compositions at Steinway Hall, on April 16, showed refinement and commendable ambition. He was assisted by Miss Alice Mandeville and Mr. John Adams (vocalists), and Miss Rhoda Simpson (violinist).

Recitals have been given by Miss Edith Walton (pianist), Miss von Sayn and Miss Grace Potter (violinist and pianist), Miss Doru Bernich (pianist), Miss Myra Hess (pianist), Miss Iona Robertson (singer of Gaelic songs), Mr. Edward Ramsay (vocalist), Mr. Cecil Harrison (vocalist), Senhor Vianna da Motta (pianist), Mr. J. Campbell McInnes (vocalist), Mr. Jules Wertheim (pianist), Mrs. Hazzard Peacock (vocalist), Mr. Sydney Rosenbloom (pianist), Misses Maude Dixon and Clara Clark (pianists), Miss Edith Clegg (vocalist), Miss Beatrice Harrison (violinist), Miss Tasma Moore (vocalist).

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Mr. Donald F. Tovey gave a second 'Chelsea' Concert at the Æolian Hall, on March 19, and included in the programme a Serenade for wind instruments by Julius Röntgen, and a similar work by Mozart. His own contribution was Schubert's B flat Pianoforte sonata.

The last chamber concert of the term at the Royal College of Music took place on March 27, when Mozart's D major Quartet was the principal work on the programme.

The orchestral concert given by the Royal Academy of Music at Queen's Hall, under the direction of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, on March 19, had the usual spirit and interest. The new works brought forward were two songs by Miss Morfydd Owen, sung by Miss May Purcell.

A concert of unusual interest took place at the New Central Hall, Westminster, on April 9, when Mrs. Layton's Ladies' Choir and Barclay's Bank Musical Society (male voices) joined forces in a performance of 'The Golden Legend,' under the direction of Mr. J. W. Lewis, conductor of the latter body. The choral singing maintained a high standard of vitality, expressiveness, and tone-quality, and good interpretations of the solos were given by Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Alys Gear, Mr. Ivor Walters, Mr. Greeves Johnson, and Mr. A. E. Drinkwater. The Ladies' Choir was also heard, with orchestral accompaniment, in Bruch's 'Morgenstunde,' with Miss Margaret Layton as soloist, Brahms's 'The death of Trenar' with accompaniment for two horns and a harp, and in Mendelssohn's 'Surrexit.' The whole programme was ably carried out, and a large audience expressed abundant satisfaction.

A special sacred concert was given on Good Friday at the Central Hall, Westminster, and one of the special features was the brilliant violoncello playing of Miss Hilda Turpin. The other artists were Miss Maude Wilby, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Constable, Mr. Allen Engles (vocalists), and Mr. J. A. Meale, organist and accompanist.

Suburban Concerts.

'Elijah' was performed by the Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society at the second concert of its sixth season, on March 19, at Chiswick Town Hall. The choir and orchestra numbered nearly 200, and achieved one of the best performances ever given by this flourishing Society. The solo vocalists were Misses Bessie Jones, Aimée Parkerson, Messrs. Gwilym Richards, and Jackson Potter. Mr. David M. Davis conducted.

The 'Messiah,' as usual, drew a huge audience to the People's Palace on Good Friday, when the Choral and Orchestral Societies performed the work under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Idle. The choral singing was the feature of the performance which gave evidence of excellent training. The soloists were Miss Doris Carter, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. William Higley.

A 'farewell concert' was given at the Royal Forest Hotel, Chingford, on March 27, by Mrs. Alex. Parnis, who contributed pianoforte solos to the programme. A small choral party gave Hamish MacCunn's 'The wreck of the Hesperus.'

A concert was given by the Claybury Glee Class, Woodford, conducted by Mr. Henry Riding, on March 29. Miss Mumford, Miss Doris Ziegle, Nurse Lovell, Madame Grace Day Winter, and Mr. Claude Dyer sang solos very acceptably, and the accompaniments were shared by Nurse Margaret Williams and Mr. H. Riding.

A fine performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given by the Lewisham Choral Society, on April 3, under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle. The singing of the choir reached a very high standard and delighted a crowded audience. The principals were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Mabel Corran, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The second half of the programme consisted of selections from Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana.'

The last concert of the present season given by the Central Croydon Choral Society took place at the Public Hall, Croydon, on April 5. The event derived more than usual importance from the fact that the work selected was Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius,' and also that it was the first public performance of the work in Croydon. Miss Effie Martyn (the Angel), Mr. Hubert Eisdell (Gerontius), and Mr. Herbert Tracey (Priest) were earnest and intelligent exponents of the solo music, and a band and choir of 180 performers, both considerably augmented for the occasion, were under the watchful guidance of the Society's indefatigable conductor, Mr. Roland A. Richards. Taken as a whole the performance was distinctly successful, the choral work, in particular, showing evidence of careful preparation. Croydon should be congratulated on the possession of so enterprising a Society and conductor.

The annual concert of the Stroud Green Choral Association took place at St. Luke's Hall, on April 8, with great success. The principal choral numbers, in which the singers appeared to good advantage, under the conductorship of Mr. H. J. Timothy, were Fletcher's Choral Fantasia on 'Die Meistersinger' and original cantata 'The Deacon's Masterpiece,' and Wilbye's Madrigal, 'Sweet honey-sucking bees.' The soloists of the occasion were Miss Miriam Timothy (harpist), Madame Lily Jönsson, Mr. Wilfrid Lawrence, Mr. Reginald Atkins, and Miss Ethel Osborne (pianist).

The Streatham and South London String Orchestra gave a very successful concert at Streatham Town Hall on April 8. The solo artists were Miss Clara Butterworth (vocalist) and M. Emile Sauret (violinist), and the programme included works by Dvorák, Vieuxtemps, Arensky, Bach, and Coleridge-Taylor, with some songs by Montague Phillips. The conductor was Mr. Sydney Roljohns.

The Buckhurst Hill Choral Society and the Chingford Choral Society joined forces for two concerts given at Buckhurst Hill on April 8, and at Chingford on April 15. The work was Henry Smart's 'The Bride of Dunkerron,' which received excellent interpretation on both occasions from the combined forces, under the conductorship of Mr. Otley Marshall, who deserves all praise for the way he directed this work. On April 8 the soloists were Miss Bessie Jones, Mr. Edward Bennett, and Mr. Walter Kingsley, with Mr. Bristow Robinson at the pianoforte, and Mr. Ernest Woods at the organ. On April 15 the soloists were Madame Anna Shergold, Mr. Edward Bennett, Mr. Constantine Morris, with Miss Helen Mathieson at the pianoforte. Besides the cantata, the choir sang Faning's 'Moonlight' at the end of the concert, and at Chingford this was so finely given that the audience demanded its repetition.

The Great-Western Railway Musical Society's last concert of the season was given at Paddington on April 9, the programme beginning with Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and ending with Elgar's 'Banner of St. George.' Both were efficiently sung under Mr. Henry A. Hughes's direction by a keen and capable choir, well-supported by a small orchestra. The soloists were Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Kathleen Covernton, Mr. Philip Ritte, and Mr. Joseph Farrington. Between the two cantatas came an interesting selection of vocal and orchestral music. Mr. Reginald Hughes was the accompanist.

The Finchley Musical Society gave a concert on April 10 in King Edward's Hall, Church End, when 'The death of Minnehaha,' and 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' were performed. The soloists were Mrs. William Hollis and Mr. Charles Martin. Mr. Herbert Baggs conducted.

The Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society gave a splendid performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' on April 12, and equalled all their past triumphs in this work. Mr. Allen Gill conducted, and the solo parts were taken by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. Edward Davies, and Mr. Stewart Gardner.

The Ealing Choral and Orchestral Society, on April 15, gave a very successful concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust.' The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Lily Grahame, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, Mr. Walter Kingsley, and Mr. Charles Knowles. Recently the same Society gave a Sunday afternoon concert at Wormwood Scrubs Prison. A choir and orchestra of 160 joined in a splendid performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.' The soloists were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Alice Lakin, and Mr. Lloyd Chandos. Mr. Albert Thompson conducted on both occasions.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST.

The Philharmonic season was brought to a close on March 28, when the fourth concert was given. There was considerable interest taken beforehand in this event, as it was felt it would be a critical point in the Society's history. Their new conductor, Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, had in the first three concerts of the season shown that he was capable of high aim and high execution, and if his fourth appearance kept to the same or a higher level, it was felt that his fitness for his responsible post and the future of the Society might be considered completely assured.

All misgiving, if there was any, was completely removed by the performance, which was in every way a striking success.

The programme was very varied, the chief works selected being Bach's Magnificat in D and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.' In the former the principal parts were sung by Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. Herbert Heyner.

The orchestra, besides accompanying, played two numbers from Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite; Smetana's overture, 'The Bartered Bride,' and two of Brahms's 'Hungarian Dances' (orchestration by A. Parlow), and Mozart's Minuet in D, 'Divertimento' No. 17, or strings and two horns.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Midland Musical Society's customary Good Friday concert was given in the Town Hall as usual, the whole choral programme being devoted to Brahms. It included the 'German Requiem,' 'Song of Destiny' and 'Alto Rhapsody.' Finally there came Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, given by special request. Mr. A. J. Cotton, the conductor, had already introduced the 'German Requiem' to the masses on Good Friday a year ago, and judging by its favourable reception and appreciation from a large audience, Mr. Cotton was justified in placing it once more in the programme. The performance on the part of the chorists was quite good on the whole, the voices being resonant and well balanced. Portions of Section 3 were omitted, as on the previous occasion. The 'Song of Destiny' proved a severe test for the orchestra. Miss Chatterley Ingram took the solo part in the 'Alto Rhapsody' in which the singing of the male-voice choir was not conspicuously good. In addition to Miss Ingram, the principals included Miss Hilda Reynolds and Mr. Alfred Askey, the organist being Mr. C. W. Perkins.

The Birmingham Chamber Concerts Society held their last musical function of the season at the Queen's College on March 18, the executants again being the Catterall String Quartet. Perfect unanimity and artistic expression characterized their playing of Beethoven's String quartet in E flat, Op. 130, and the same composer's String quintet in C major, Op. 29, in which Mr. C. A. Butler occupied the desk of the second viola.

The customary terminal concert provided by the orchestra of the Midland Institute School of Music was given in the large Lecture Theatre on March 17, under the able direction of Professor Granville Bantock. It was quite delightful to listen to Haydn's fourth 'Salomon' (known as the 'Paukenwirbel') Symphony, of which a performance of distinct merit was given. Of much interest was a short Concerto in G minor, No. 1, for strings, by Charles Avison (1710-70), the score of which Professor Bantock bought in a second-hand bookshop in Charing Cross Road, for one shilling. There is much solidity and variety in its structure, indeed a work of decided merit which one was glad to hear, its interpretation being wonderfully clear in accent, phrasing, and rhythm, and sonorous in tone. Ippolitov Ivanoff's 'Armenian Rhapsody' on national themes, Op. 78, scored for full orchestra, with important violin solos, the latter excellently played by Miss Zoë M. Wadely, the leader of the orchestra, proved another novelty, a picturesque performance being realised by the orchestra. A student of the School, William Fenney, figured as the composer and conductor of a 'Pastorale' for orchestra, which showed considerable inventive power, and talent for orchestral colouring. The vocal interlude was Bach's cantata for soprano solo and orchestra, 'Non sa che sia dolore,' scored for strings, flutes, and 'celmalo, probably written at Leipzig between 1723-37. The vocalist was Miss Eva Badger.

Mr. Joseph H. Adams, the conductor of the Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association, directed a concert recital of Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana' at the Town Hall on April 5, the occasion being the last of the series of concerts provided for the season by this musical organization. The choir sang remarkably well, and the orchestra was in good form.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra gave a special concert at the Town Hall on April 6, for which Mr. Julian Clifford, the conductor, who has done so much for this orchestra, arranged an excellent programme, including Beethoven's Overture 'Leonore' No. 3, and Glazounoff's Symphony No. 6. Of special interest was the first appearance in England of the Russian pianist Miss Maria Levinskaya. Her splendid performance of Liszt's E flat Concerto aroused great enthusiasm, as also did her playing of Liszt's 'Mephisto' waltz. Mr. Robert Radford was the vocalist.

A Wagner concert was given by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society in the Town Hall on April 10, being the last of the current series. Dr. Sinclair, who conducted, submitted a typical programme. The principals were Madame Agnes Nicholls, Mr. John Harrison, and Mr. Frederic Austin, an admirable trio of vocalists of operatic experience. The little work that fell to the choir was well done, but the orchestra, especially in the 'Feuerzauber' music, was disappointing. Many rehearsals are needed to do justice to such a programme, with principals and orchestra; but this of course is impossible in the provinces.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The winter musical season is now fast waning, and another month will see the finish of the current series of concerts. The rather drastic changes lately made in the personnel of the Municipal Orchestra do not seem to have had any marked detrimental effect upon the organization, the new members having settled down with commendable expedition. Nevertheless, although the constitution of the band has not suffered to any great extent, it must be owned that one or two of those who have left its ranks cannot be easily replaced. But the control of a permanent musical body is no sinecure, and Mr. Dan Godfrey has done his best to maintain the reputation of his famous orchestra.

A continuance of his policy to provide for all tastes has characterised the programmes which Mr. Godfrey has submitted at the Symphony Concerts during the past few weeks, the Symphonies performed being the No. 4 of Beethoven, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathétique,' Dvorák's 'New World,' the Symphony in E flat by Glazounoff, and a Symphony in A by Malishevsky (first performance in England). The soloists at these concerts included Miss Rita Neve (Holbrooke's poem for pianoforte and orchestra, 'The Song of Gwynap Nudd'), Miss Dorothy Bridson (first performance of a violin concerto by Arnold Trowell, conducted by the composer), Mr. Johan Wysman (Busoni's orchestral arrangement of Liszt's 'Spanish Rhapsody' for pianoforte), Miss Jacoba Wolters, of the Municipal Orchestra (Debussy's 'Danse Sacrée et Danse Profane' for harp and orchestra), and Mr. Arnold Trowell (Saint-Saëns's 'Cello concerto No. 2'). It will be noticed that there has been a certain predominance of modern works, and this feature has also extended, in a slightly lesser degree, to the smaller compositions, of which the most interesting were Weber's 'Oberon' Overture, Strauss's tone-poem 'Tod und Verklärung,' the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal' (Wagner), Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture, and Debussy's prelude 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune.' On April 3, Mr. Granville Bantock visited us, and conducted performances of his 'Overture to a Greek tragedy,' and the serenade for strings entitled 'In the Far West.'

Eclecticism, too, has distinguished the programmes of the Monday 'Pops,' and no charge of partiality towards this or that particular school of thought could be upheld. On March 12, the programme was devoted to Mendelssohn. On March 31, to Wagner. The twenty-fifth concert illustrated the 'Evolution of the Symphony.' British music was the subject of the following week's concert, but it was a very unrepresentative programme, the only eminent composers from whom orchestral works were drawn being Elgar, Mackenzie, and Sullivan, and the items against their names being hardly of first-class importance. Dr. Charles Maclean conducted his tone-poem 'Fanni's Fest-tag,' and Mr. Robert Chignell, in addition to conducting his 'Romeo and Juliet' prelude, sang Vaughan Williams's fine songs 'The Vagabond,' and 'Bright is the ring of words,' the remaining item being the Variations by Dr. H. Holloway, chorus-master of the Bournemouth Municipal Choir. The examples of chamber-music performed at the above concerts were Rubinstein's Sonata for viola and pianoforte, played by Messrs. Mauritz Speelman and Montague Birch, members of the orchestra, and Brahms's Sonata for pianoforte and cello in E minor, which was performed by Miss Edith Leach, a local artist, and Mr. S. Coelho, professor of the violoncello at the Bournemouth School of Music.

Apart from the serial concerts there have been a little quiet—for Bournemouth! Dr. Markham Lee's concluding lectures had for their subjects 'Grieg' and 'Dvorák,' and the other events which call for record were the visits of Madame Pauline Donalda, Mr. W. H. Squire (orchestral concert), Mr. Montague Borwell and Miss Caroline Hatchard (vocal recital), and Mr. Vernon Warner and Miss Daisy Kennedy (pianoforte and violin recital). The orchestral concerts on Good Friday were graced by the presence of Miss Phyllis Lett, and Mr. Godfrey's benefit concerts on April 5 were noteworthy for the galaxy of 'stars' that came to the support of the beneficiare.

A matter extraneous to the Winter Gardens but of real importance to musicians must not be overlooked. This was the opening on March 26 of the new Central Library, in which is installed the fine music library of over 3,000 volumes, the magnificent gift to the town of Mr. J. B. M. Camm. The building was opened by the Mayor (Alderman H. S. McCalmont Hill, D.C.L.), who was supported by the Mayoress, the members of the Corporation, and the members of the Libraries Committee, and among those who attended the ceremony were Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. Dan Godfrey (musical director to the Corporation), Mrs. Farnell-Watson and Mr. Hamilton Law (directors of the Bournemouth School of Music), Mr. Allan Biggs, and Mr. Hadley Watkins.

BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

The Bristol Musical Society gave 'The Messiah' at the Victoria Rooms on March 15, with a choir and orchestra of 300. The soloists were Miss Lilian Dillingham, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Albert Watson, and Mr. Tom Howell. Mr. Charles W. Stear conducted with skill, and Mr. Hubert Hunt was at the organ.

On March 21, the Bristol Branches of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants held their annual concert. The vocalists were Miss Carrie Lancelotti and Mr. Lloyd Chandos, whose efforts afforded great satisfaction. Mr. Zacharewitsch's violin solos were highly appreciated, and the City of Bristol Military Band (Mr. Joseph Armstrong, conductor) contributed some compositions that found general favour among the large audience.

In celebration of the Wagner centenary, the Bristol Choral Society, on April 5, at Colston Hall, gave a performance of 'The Flying Dutchman.' The choral and instrumental forces numbered 500, Mr. Harold Bernard being the leader. The solo music was sung by Miss Perceval Allen (Senta), Miss Gertrude Winchester (Mary, the nurse), Mr. Maurice D'Oisly (the Helmsman and Erik), Mr. Robert Radford (Daland), and Mr. Charles Knowles (Van der Decken). Mr. George Riseley conducted with great ability, and the numerous auditors expressed their gratification in no measured terms at the adequate performance.

The fourth and final concert of the Clifton Quintet was held on April 7 at the Victoria Rooms, the principal works performed being Ravel's Quartet in F major, Dale's Fantasy in D minor for viola and pianoforte, executed by Messrs. Best and Parsons, and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat, Op. 44. All these works were admirably interpreted.

At the Victoria Rooms, on April 9, the Society of Bristol Gleemen held their Ladies' Night, and under the capable direction of Mr. Charles W. Stear some charming examples for male-voices were sung. Among the principal pieces given were 'The King of worlds' (Dard-Janin), 'To the sons of Art' (Mendelssohn) 'Enceladus' (composed for the Society many years ago by Dr. C. W. Pearce), 'After many a dusty mile' and 'Feasting, I watch' (Elgar). Miss Elsie Chambers was heard with pleasure in Elgar's 'Like to the damask rose,' and other lyrics, the accompanist being Mr. Alec Ransom.

Bristol New Philharmonic Society on April 16 gave a concert at the Victoria Rooms under the direction of Mr. Arnold Barter. Mr. Percy Grainger was present, and directed the performance of four folk-songs collected and arranged by himself. There were selections from Handel's 'Samson,' Granville Bantock's 'Sea Wanderers,' and the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger,' the last-named by way of celebrating the Wagner centenary. Mr. Harold Bernard was the leader. The solo vocalists were Miss Doris Carter, Miss Violet Love, Mr. Henry Turpenney, and Mr. Percy Heming. The concert gratified a large audience.

The spring concert of the Clevedon Philharmonic Society was held in the Public Hall on April 2. The compositions given were nearly all by Coleridge-Taylor, the first part consisting of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'A tale of Old Japan,' and the second section of part-songs. Considering the limited resources these productions were creditably sung. The soloists were Miss Winifred Thomas, Miss Eveleen Yeates, Mr. R. Hoare Byers, and Mr. Everard Henley. The accompaniments were played on the pianoforte by Mr. G. W. Ryder, and Mr. Edward Cook directed the performance.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

Lent and Easter were as usual noted in churches and chapels by performances of special music, the choirs which thus celebrated the season being St. Andrew's, St. Saviour's, St. Catherine's, St. Simon's, St. Peter's, All Saints', St. James the Less, King Street and Mount Gold Wesleyan, Salisbury Road Baptist (Plymouth), St. George's (Stonehouse), St. James's, St. Michael's, and St. John's (Devonport).

A very excellent performance of 'Samson' was given on April 9 by Ebenezer Wesleyan Choir, the choral-singing being marked by good quality and careful expression. Mr. David Parkes conducted with command and discretion. The performers numbered 150. Mr. Stanley Parsonson was the organist.

The choir of the Institution for the Blind at North Hill gave solos and choruses on April 10, under the direction of Mr. Frederick Weekes, Hiller's 'A song of victory' being the chief number. Mr. Arthur C. Faull conducted Sherwell Choir in an interesting programme of choruses by Bach, Mendelssohn, Bantock, and Elgar on April 16.

The Misses Smith closed their second season of Musical Matinées on March 26, the programme including the Brahms Sonata for violin and pianoforte, Op. 78, played by Mr. Max Mossel and Miss Florence Smith. With charitable objects a chamber-concert was given on April 1, which included a performance of a Rheinberger Pianoforte quartet by Miss F. Woolland, Messrs. R. Ball, C. G. Pike, and H. Kühne. At Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society's concert on April 7 the novelty was the fresh and tuneful Symphony in G minor by Kalinnikoff. Dr. Weekes and Mr. Walter Weekes conducted. Miss Gladys Moger (vocalist) and Mr. Herbert Fryer (pianoforte) combined to give a charming recital at Plymouth on April 16. On April 1 Mr. Walter Hampson gave a recital of thirteen violin pieces.

'The wave song,' a clever musical play by Mr. A. W. Venning, of Liskeard, which was produced in this town last season, was performed twice in Devonport on April 1, under the conductorship of Mr. J. C. Lyle.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

At Dodbrooke Parish Church, on March 18, the church choir sang 'The Crucifixion,' under the direction of Mr. J. Dawson Hands. The cantata, 'Footprints of the Saviour,' was sung by the choir of Bampton United Methodist Church on the same date, when Mr. S. Mogford conducted the choir and band. St. Barnabas' Quartet (vocal) at Ridgway collaborated with the Wesleyan Orchestra, under Mr. Wickett, in an interesting concert. Maunders' 'Penitence, Pardon and Peace' was sung in Totnes Parish Church on March 20, with Mr. H. Worth at the organ; and Anderton's cantata 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' was admirably performed at Ermington, on March 26, by the church choir and friends, assisted by a string band conducted by Mrs. Caunter. Chagford Choral Society gave a very good account of themselves in Cowen's 'St. John's Eve' on March 26, conducted by Mr. Percy Collings. Members of the band which assisted played a String quartet, 'Canzonetta,' by Blanc. One of the finest performances of 'Elijah' heard in the West for many years was that of the Barnstaple Musical Society on March 31. Dr. H. J. Edwards conducted, and the principals were the Misses Caroline Hatchard and May Peters, and Messrs. John Perry and Percy Heming. That most beautiful swan-song, 'A tale of Old Japan,' was given with fair success at Plympton by the Choral Society, conducted by Mr. D. Parkes, on April 1.

The Festival of the Exeter Oratorio Society, with which is incorporated the Western Counties Musical Association, fell back on 'Samson' as the work for the morning concert. In the evening, they sang Dr. Edwards's oratorio, 'The Ascension,' in compliment to their popular co-conductor, and followed this with 'A tale of Old Japan.' Dr. D. J. Wood, who has for thirty years been conductor,—since the amalgamation sharing the post with Dr. Edwards,—was to the regret of all unable to take part this year, owing to ill-health. Mr. Allan Allen, chorus-master, took the baton for the Coleridge-Taylor work. The band (led by Mr. A. James) and choir numbered 500, and the singing was of a more artistic and capable standard than it has been sometimes.

Under Mr. Harold O. Jones, Ashburton Choral Society gave a programme of part-songs by A. R. Mote, Pointer, Oakeley, and Stanford, on April 3. Sidmouth Choral and Orchestral Society shared the credit of a concert of high standard on April 8, when the works 'A tale of Old Japan' and 'The May Queen' were conducted by Mr. J. A. Bellamy. Mr. F. J. Pinn's Exeter Male-Voice Choir gave a concert on April 9; and on April 10, Honiton Choral Society sang German's 'The Princess of Kensington' and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' conducted by Mr. Stanley Chipperfield.

The Dawlish Orchestra and the Dawlish Quartet (vocal) gave a concert at Teignmouth on March 24; and Mr. F. A. Curtis on that date gave a chamber concert at North Tawton. The ladies' orchestra connected with the Exeter Literary Society included in their programme on March 27, selections from 'The Jewels of the Madonna,' 'Mignon,' and 'Carmen,' and played a sketch, 'A day in Naples,' by Byng. Messrs. Robert Tranent and N. Kendall assisted. Torquay Municipal Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Basil Hindenberg, visited Exeter on March 28, when a delightful programme was excellently played. Madame Miguel-Alzien was associated with the band in a Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, by Rimsky-Korsakoff. String quartets by Borodine, Mozart, and Grainger, were played at Exmouth on April 2 by the Misses Rachel Fell, Agnes Ramsbotham, Dorothy Jones, and Rosa Button, with vocal pieces by Mrs. Arthur Bird and instrumental solos. Mr. Walter Twining gave a concert in the Torquay Pavilion on April 3, the programme consisting of vocal solos and concerted pieces. Madame Blanche Marchesi and Mr. Mark Hambourg visited Exeter on April 4. On April 9, at Paignton, Mr. H. M. Walbrook (London) gave a lecture on 'Robert and Clara Schumann.' Miss Pine Coppin gave a vocal recital at Exeter on April 9, and at Sidmouth, on April 14, Miss Dorothy Holden gave convincing evidence of her pianistic gifts. The twenty-first concert of the Haydn String Quartet at Torquay, on April 10, included Haydn's Op. 76, No. 3, and Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 3. Mr. Henry G. Ley (pianoforte), with Miss Enid Knight Bruce (violin), gave a classical programme at Exeter on April 11, both artists proving to be highly gifted.

WAGNER FESTIVAL AT TORQUAY.

Mr. Basil Hindenberg, the very gifted conductor of the Torquay Municipal Band, carried through with high artistic success a two-days' Wagner Festival in the Pavilion on April 15 and 16. Though the band has only been in existence for less than nine months, Mr. Hindenberg has by his intense enthusiasm and artistic thoroughness brought it to a conspicuously high state of capability. The scheme of the Festival did not attempt anything of historic significance. It was a series of performances of miscellaneous Wagner excerpts, chiefly orchestral, with Miss Carrie Tubb, and Messrs. Frank Mullings (who scored a great success), and Thorpe Bates as vocalists. The band was augmented to sixty, and from an interpretative point of view the performances were wonderfully near to the ideal. Mr. Hindenberg is still under thirty, and there is every reason to expect that he will become a conductor of great reputation.

It is gratifying to record that a good financial result—a profit of nearly £100—has encouraged the authorities to consider the organization of a Festival next year extending over several days.

CORNWALL.

The chief event which has absorbed the interest of the county generally has been the Festival of the Cornwall Music Competitions. This is described in the Competition Festival Record.

Truro Cathedral Choir performed Bach's 'Passion' in the Cathedral, on March 18, under the direction of Dr. Monk. 'From Olivet to Calvary' was sung by Falmouth All Saints' Choir, on March 19, with Miss Cooper at the organ, and Camborne Wesleyan Choir performed 'Samson' on March 21, assisted by a good band under the conductorship of Mr. H. V. Pearce. Selections from 'The Messiah' and 'Elijah' were sung by Mullion Choral Society on March 24. Mrs. W. E. Odgers conducting and Miss Rimbault accompanying.

The united choirs of Falmouth Wesleyan Circuit, under the baton of Mr. C. W. Chard, gave a concert at Penryn on March 26; and at Pool, on the next day, Pool Excelsior Male Choir, conducted by Mr. H. Cock, sang choruses and solos. The choir of the Church of the Good Shepherd, at Par, sang part-songs on March 27, and 'Hiawatha's departure' was performed by Looe Choral Society on that date with a capable band, Dr. Harold C. Lake conducting and producing some fine choral effects. The second and third parts of the 'Hiawatha' trilogy were chosen by Callington Choral Society for their concert, also on the same date. Mr. H. P. Giles conducted. The choir, though numbering only forty voices, sang remarkably well. On March 28, Camborne Orpheus Glee Party gave a concert, and the Delabole Quartet (vocal) sang glees at Pengelly on the same date, the choir of the P.M. Church contributing anthems. The choir of Penryn P.M. Church sang anthems and solos at a sacred concert on March 31. At their annual concert on April 2, Marazion Ladies' Choral Society of twenty-one voices sang pieces by Walford Davies, Baynon, and Pinsuti. Conducted by Mr. Alan Thorne, Bennett's 'The May Queen' was artistically sung by the Lostwithiel Choral Society on April 2, St. Andrew's Quartet (Plymouth) also contributing to the programme. The choir consisted of eighty well-balanced voices, capably trained by Mr. G. A. Russell. Though only in the second year of its life St. Ives Choral Society is vigorous and artistically capable, as was evidenced at the concert on April 3, when Lloyd's 'Hero and Leander,' was excellently sung. Mr. Ernest White was the conductor. Part-songs and operatic choruses were sung by the choir and friends of St. Brevard Church on April 9, Mr. F. E. Brook conducting, and on April 9 also the choir of Helston U.M. Church sang 'Samson,' under the direction of Mr. W. W. Howlett at the organ and Mr. J. T. Hawke conducting.

Newquay Orchestral and Choral Societies performed Alexander's Feast' on April 9, conducted by Mr. Crosby Smith.

Mr. J. Rawlings gave a lecture on 'Old Methodist Tunes' in Falmouth U.M. Church on April 8, the choir affording illustrations under the direction of Mr. C. Spargo.

At her annual concert at St. Austell on March 27, Miss Maria Yelland had a cordial reception, and sang ballads with fine vocalisation and intensity of feeling.

DUBLIN.

The Philharmonic Society, under Dr. Charles Marchant gave a performance of Handel's 'Samson' on April 3. Miss Alice Rafter, Miss Eileen Price, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Percy Whitehead, being the soloists.

Miss Nora Thomson's quartet (Miss Nora Thomson, Miss Madeleine Moore, Mr. Harris Rosenberg, and Mr. Clyde Twelvetees) gave a concert on April 14. The programme included the Quartets by Mendelssohn, Op. 12, and Brahms in A minor. Miss Madeleine Macken was the vocalist.

Signor Palmieri has resigned his position as professor of singing at the Royal Irish Academy of Music. There is a good opening here for a first-class singing teacher.

EDINBURGH.

The choral season here practically finished with Mr. Moonie's Choir concert on Wednesday, March 26. It is an event always looked forward to by lovers of choral music because of the novelties produced and the certainty of a 'vital' rendering. The programme this year departed from beaten tracks in so far that no large works were performed. It was arranged to give a kind of 'bird's-eye' view of development in choral style from Palestrina to the present day. The selection was excellent and varied. Palestrina, Astorga, Festa, Bantock, Bruch, German, Bairstow, Faning, Coleridge-Taylor, and Von Holst were all drawn upon for contribution. The items of greatest interest were the section of 'Atalanta in Calydon' for female voices by Granville Bantock, and the set of Choral Hymns from the 'Rig Veda' of G. Von Holst. The latter suffered from lack of orchestral accompaniment and from being the last item on a very long programme. A work demanding so much intensity of interpretation and intensity of listening cannot be judged of at the end of a programme. It is to be hoped that these two items will be repeated next season, as, with this concert's experience, the choir will be better able to enter into and appreciate the idiom of the 'new choralism.'

The choir was well balanced and the alto tone was particularly fine. A string quartet party, led by Miss Emily Buchanan, vocal items by Miss A. Cleugh, Mr. Oldham, Mr. Campbell, and other members of the choir, completed an interesting programme.

Two other concerts call for notice. The Advanced Class of the Royal Choral Union gave an excellent concert under their new conductor, Mr. Gavin Godfrey, on April 5. In their selections from Handel's 'Judas Macabæus,' good tone, fine articulation, and precision of attack were always in evidence. A four-part arrangement of 'The flowers of the forest,' by the conductor, gave the audience an opportunity of judging of the painstaking nature of Mr. Godfrey's work during the season just closed.

The V.M.C.A. Musical Association, a comparatively recent Society, drew a large audience to a performance of Gade's 'The Erl King's daughter' on April 12. In view of the fact that the conductor, Mr. E. W. Winning, took over the duties in the middle of a session, a remarkably good interpretation was given, and the choir's performance next season will be looked forward to with interest. The choir numbered between eighty and ninety, and viewing this occasion along with a résumé of the past season there seem to be signs in Edinburgh of a revival of interest in choral music.

GLOUCESTER AND DISTRICT.

The annual meeting of the Gloucester Orpheus Society was held on Monday, March 17, Mr. H. Godwin Chance presiding, and being supported by Dr. A. Herbert Brewer and a large number of members. The officers of the Society having been re-elected, it was decided to approve the action of the committee in voting the sum of seven guineas towards the funds of the Gloucester District Nursing Society. In future the annual concert of the Society will be held on the second Thursday before Ash Wednesday.

Miss Dorothy Dawe, the possessor of a rich contralto voice of considerable range and flexibility, to which is added an artistic temperament and power of sympathetic expression, gave a couple of concerts in her native town of Newnham on April 2.

The Cirencester Choral Society gave an impressive performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio, 'St. Paul,' on Thursday, April 3. Under the conductorship of Mr. A. H. Gibbons, the choir sang excellently, proving themselves a finely-balanced band of vocalists. The soloists were Miss Gladys Moger, Miss May Chuter, Mr. G. Brierley, and Mr. Greeves Johnson. The orchestra was under the leadership of Mr. A. Le Galley, who brought a large draft of musicians from the famous band of the Royal Marine Artillery.

An ambitious programme was presented by the Gloucestershire Orchestral Society at their annual concert in the Shire Hall, Gloucester, on April 3. Judged by any test, the playing reflected the greatest possible credit upon all concerned, from the conductor down to the youngest performer. Few amateur societies relying so little upon professional help could attempt with such success a complete Symphony by Brahms—in this case the second (D major). The soloists for the occasion were Miss May Huxley and Mr. W. H. Reed (violinist). Dr. A. Herbert Brewer conducted throughout.

The members of the Stroud Choral Society have many brilliant successes standing to their credit, but all previous efforts were surpassed on Thursday, April 10, when they gave a really fine performance of the 'Dream of Gerontius,' under the conductorship of Mr. S. W. Underwood. The soloists were Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Percy E. Underwood (a younger brother of the conductor).

The Gloucester Co-operative Prize Choir gave an excellent performance of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' at their concert in the Shire Hall on April 17. Mr. S. W. Underwood has trained this choir to a high state of efficiency, and is to be congratulated on the great success of his labours.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The twelfth and closing concert of the Philharmonic Society on March 18 was noteworthy as being the occasion of Mr. Harry Evans's first appearance as 'guest-conductor' at these famous concerts. The event had been anticipated with interest, and the 'Elijah' given under his inspiring direction will long be remembered not only for the magnificent choral performance, but also for a display of enthusiasm which is rarely aroused in the Philharmonic Hall. In this the forces, orchestral as well as choral, joined with the audience. The event in some respects was unique, and the invitation to Mr. Harry Evans did the Philharmonic Society credit. The success of the experiment has set the seal on Mr. Evans's reputation as a choral conductor par excellence. His magnetic influence has never been more potently displayed than in the case of the Philharmonic chorus, which at first rather resented the domination of the forceful conductor of the Welsh Choral Union. But before the rehearsals were ended they became a united and responsive body of choralists, with the result that an interpretation of the work was given which exceeded that of a mere performance. In it were associated as vocal principals Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Herbert Brown, while the subsidiary quartet of picked local singers comprised Miss Edina Thraves, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. George Barnett, and Mr. Samuel Mann. The fine orchestra was led by Mr. Rawdon Briggs, with Mr. Branscombe at the organ.

The Philharmonic committee have arranged with Sir Frederic Cowen to undertake the office of chorus-master for next season, as well as to conduct four concerts of the usual series of twelve. Mr. Harry Evans has been appointed resident choral conductor, and Mr. Branscombe will retain the position of organist to the Society and accompanist at the choral rehearsals. During next season there will be only two choral concerts, one of which will be the 'Messiah.'

An interesting paper entitled 'An evening with old English Church composers' was read by Mr. C. W. Bridson before a well-attended meeting of the Liverpool and District Organists' and Choirmasters' Association, on April 7. The lecturer had the signal advantage of the help of his choir from St. Nicholas's Parish Church, who worthily sustained their reputation in the musical illustrations selected from Tallis, Farrant, Wise, Purcell, and Boyce.

On Good Friday there was a crowded audience in St. George's Hall at the thirty-sixth annual free performance of the 'Messiah,' given to poor people to whom tickets are distributed by the clergy and ministers of all denominations. It would not be possible to collect a more appreciative audience. The choir was formed by volunteers principally from the Philharmonic Society, and the solos were well sung by Madame Alice Phillips, Miss Teresa Amalfi, Mr. H. Pope, and Mr. S. Mann. The City Organist, Mr. Ellingford, sustained the accompaniments, and Mr. Branscombe conducted. In the evening a performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' and Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' was given by the Liverpool Choral Union in the Central Hall. Mr. Ingram conducted, and the vocal principals included Madame Lily Moffitt and Mr. Lloyd Moore. In the churches there was again a number of performances of Stainer's 'Crucifixion.'

A performance of Parts 1 and 2 of Haydn's 'Creation' was given by the Liverpool Symphonic Chorus, conducted by Mr. E. Malcolm Kelly, on April 8. Haydn's familiar music is not lightly to be undertaken by either vocal principals or choirs, and the performance hardly reached the standard requisite in a public performance to which attention was invited. The choir of forty voices is especially strong in soprano; additional tenor and bass tone is desirable. There was evidence of good material available, and the progress of the Symphonic Choir will be watched with interest. A word of appreciation is due to the expert pianoforte playing of Mr. G. S. Webb, who provided accompaniments.

The Brodsky Quartet has notably maintained a reputation of the highest by their four concerts in St. George's Hall, of which the closing one was given on April 5. The programme included the Brahms Quartet in B flat, Op. 67, and the Schubert Quintet in C, Op. 163. Miss Mary McCullagh assisting. A novelty was provided in Ludwig Thuille's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, a work of musicianly interest if not individual distinction. It was very cleverly played by Madame Marguerite Stilwell and Mr. Carl Fuchs. Dr. Brodsky intends to resume his delightful concerts in the autumn.

Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen' was sung by the St. Andrew's Choral and Orchestral Society on April 11, and at the closing concert of the fifth season of the Anfield Orchestral Society on April 16. Mr. William Faulkes conducted performances of the 'Oberon' and 'Masaniello' Overtures. The solo part in Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte concerto was played by Miss Beatrice Skillicorn, who also collaborated with Mr. Pierpoint (trumpet) and the strings of the orchestra in four movements from Saint-Saëns's Septuor for strings, trumpet, and pianoforte.

Two Cheshire amateur orchestral Societies, the Liscard, and the Oxtou and Claughton, deserve honourable mention for excellent work done during the past season. Conducted by Mr. Philip Smart, the Liscard Orchestral Society, at their closing concert on April 5, played Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and also two 'Holiday Sketches' by Mr. J. H. Foulds. The leader of the orchestra, Mr. Thomas Rimmer, displayed his skill as a viola player in Haydn's Concerto in D, and the vocalist was Mr. George Barnett. The Oxtou and Claughton Society, which includes ladies and a complement of professional players, were heard to exceptional advantage in the Birkenhead Town Hall on April 12, when Mr. James E. Matthews conducted admirable performances of the 'Freischütz' Overture, three movements from Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, and the 'Hungarian March' from Berlioz's 'Faust.' Dr. Stanley Dale gave a masterly performance of the pianoforte part in Grieg's Concerto, Op. 16, and Miss Jean Fyans was agreeably heard in Elgar's 'Sea Songs,' accompanied by the orchestra.

A performance of Handel's 'Alexander's Feast' was given by the St. John's Choral Society, Egremont, Cheshire, on April 14. The vocal principals were Madame Eva Warren, Mr. Spencer Hayes, and Mr. Samuel Mann. Mr. W. Biller conducted. The Port Sunlight Philharmonic and Orchestral Society gave a performance of 'Elijah' on April 17, in the Gladstone Hall at Sir W. H. Lever's picturesque garden city. Mr. Seddon conducted, and the soloists included Miss Edina Thraves, Miss Georgina Phillips, Mr. H. Pope, and Mr. S. Mann.

At the Waterloo Choral Society's final 'Open Meeting' of the season Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha' and the Finale to Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' (solo, Miss M. Bennett) were sung. An interesting programme of choral items, which were conducted by Mr. J. W. Appleyard, included the part-songs 'Forest musings' (Sinigaglia), 'Easter song' (Max Reger), and 'On Jordan's banks' (Max Bruch). Miss Eastwood at the pianoforte, with Mrs. Stanley Clarke, Mr. Littlebury, and Mr. Barton as vocal soloists, gave notable service.

The Warrington Musical Society, conducted by Mr. F. H. Crossley, at their closing concert on March 12 gave a successful performance of Haydn's 'Creation,' Parts 1 and 2, with choir and orchestra of 200. The vocal principals were Miss Eva Rich, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Richard Evans. The miscellaneous items included Schubert's overture 'Aus Italien.'

The jubilee of Mr. J. F. Swift as a professional musician in Liverpool and Wallasey was recently signalled by a complimentary concert given in the Concert Hall, Liscard. Fifty years as a musician in one district is an honourable record, and the occasion was marked by a representative attendance. Mr. Swift has written several widely-popular songs under his assumed name of Godfrey Marks, and not only in his musical capacity, but also in other directions, he has been usefully identified with the welfare of the district. At the concert the singing of the Wallasey Gentlemen's Glee Club of fifty voices, conducted by Mr. Wilfrid Shaw, was an interesting feature.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Viewed in retrospect the most noteworthy characteristic of the season has been the definite emergence of popular orchestral smoking concerts as a Saturday night diversion, a counter-attraction to music hall and cinema palace. For a score of years past, spasmodic attempts have been made to popularise orchestral music in this way, but never before in such thorough fashion. The Manchester Orchestra, Ltd., had met with no opposition until Mr. Speelman's conductorship was challenged by the Brand Lane-Wood combination. From the outset it was clear that in the long run Sir Henry Wood's personality would gain the ascendancy; on the other hand, Mr. Speelman's orchestra had an established connection: still the probabilities are that Mr. Speelman has conducted his last Manchester Promenade Concert, arrangements having already been concluded whereby half of this series of concerts will next season be conducted by Mr. Balling, visiting conductors no doubt being answerable for the remainder. The Brand Lane-Wood concerts are to be increased from eight to ten, one of them to be 'Elijah' on 'Festival' scale—rehearsals for the choir extending over three months.

All Bayreuth visitors would hear the concert-performance of Acts 2 and 3 of 'Parsifal' at the concluding Hallé Concert with considerable misgivings. But what to those who have never had that experience—the vast majority in all such promiscuous gatherings—what were their impressions? Balling and his men played with ravishing beauty of tone; no one recalls any Hallé performance which had been prepared with greater care and forethought; the intricacies of the 'Flower-maiden' music never caused a moment's hesitancy to the six ladies from the Grünemann operatic school at Covent Garden, and to this certainty, amidst quite unfamiliar conditions, they united great sensuous beauty of tone. John Coates's singing of Parsifal's music had something quite 'other-worldly' about it, and placed him a long way in advance of any other English singer in such music; very rarely does one hear simplicity and subtlety of style so intimately blended. Madame Gleeson-White's interpretation of Kundry's music was naturally of striking quality. The average listener's abiding impression will almost certainly be of the glowing splendours of the orchestration for the wind instruments: the brass playing was of surpassing loveliness.

There has been the usual April aftermath of concerts of comparative interest without any of outstanding merit.

Miss Lucy Pierce, who played at the Milton Hall on April 17, shares (with possibly two others) the distinction of being the finest product of the late W. H. Dayas's teaching at the Royal Manchester College of Music. The College examinations were started earlier in the month with an orchestral concert at which the more notable performances were Mr. Frank Anderson-Tyrer's playing in the Tchaikovsky B flat minor Pianoforte concerto, and a first movement of a B flat minor Symphony by Mr. Harry Baynton-Power.

Mr. Albert J. Cross's School of Music performed Meyerbeer's 'Les Huguenots' with considerable success, not even the spectacular scenic difficulties (owing to confined space) daunting them. In Miss Frances Collinge, Miss Alice Shawcross, Mr. Alfred Collyer, and Mr. Horace Brown, the conductor is blessed with some more than ordinarily capable singers.

Mention has been made from time to time in these notes of music at our Gaiety Theatre. A well-known Labour leader and writer, Mr. Frank H. Rose, has had produced by Miss Horniman's company a new play, 'The whispering well' (soon to be heard during her London season). The play is packed full of good things and dramatic ideas, and in composing the incidental music Mr. J. H. Foulds has evidently found genuine inspiration, for both play and music are full of serious purpose. Never before has Manchester produced such a combination of drama and music.

The Cathedral 'St. Matthew' Passion service on Monday in Holy Week followed the usual lines: rather deliberate, not very evenly balanced in the antiphonal choruses, and the choir generally on the light side in weight, the extra voices used in the chorales not participating in the remaining choral work. Mr. John Collett, who sang the Narrator, goes almost immediately to St. Paul's Cathedral, being the second Manchester Cathedral singer transferred to London in the last year.

The closing meetings of the Third Quinquennial International Congress of Historical Studies were of interest to musicians, as interesting papers were read by Dr. W. H. Hadow on 'Early Tudor Church Music,' and Mr. Edward J. Dent on 'Italian Opera in the 18th century.'

The Hallé Pension Concert was only moderately attended, and really more enterprise ought to be shewn by the committee in the choice of programme. What attractions to-day can Haydn's 'Military' Symphony offer, or the 'William Tell' Overture? Time was when the Pension Concert programme was one of the choicest of the season, and a reversion to those tactics will soon restore this desirable concert to its former favour.

Two of our amateur orchestral Societies—the Beethoven and Withington—closed their twenty-fifth and twentieth seasons, and will claim some further notice next month.

One notes with regret the discontinuance of the Wilslow Concerts Society's work after twenty-seven years. Mr. Harold Brewerton and his son (an able pianist) have long been identified with this Society.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

The unwonted earliness of Easter has caused the musical season to extend beyond that date, three choral concerts and three lectures following the holidays closely. Two of the former served to introduce compositions of local musicians. 'The Doomed Temple,' a dramatic scena, a setting by Mr. McConnell Wood of words by Dr. Hemy, for choir, organ, and two pianofortes, was produced by the composer at a concert of his Northumbrian Choir on the Saturday after Easter. Mrs. Meredith was represented by two works for a similar combination, and the remainder of the programme was filled with songs. On April 3, the Jarrow Philharmonic Society produced a cantatilla, 'Eastward,' by Mr. Alfred Wall, who is best known as principal first violin at most of the local choral and orchestral concerts, and as a fine soloist. He has not been much before the public recently as a writer, but in his younger days some of his compositions appeared on important London programmes. The work in question displayed musicianly skill and contained much of interest. 'Hiawatha's Departure' was also sung, and the rest of the programme was of a miscellaneous character. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk, Messrs. J. Cheetham and R. R. Clarke. Mr. G. Dodds conducted with his usual ability and care, and secured a good choral performance. The Tyne-mouth, Whitley, and District Choral Union concluded their season on April 2 with a miscellaneous programme consisting of Handel's 'Sixth Chandos Anthem,' Brahms's 'Nänie,' Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Elgar's 'There is sweet music,' and songs by Beethoven, Grieg, Bantock, and Vaughan Williams, the latter being represented by his lovely 'Five Mystical Songs' for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra. The vocalists were Miss Dorothy Silk, and Messrs. A. Heather and H. Brown.

The enterprising operatic impresario, Mr. T. Quinlan, prefaces his Colonial tour of the 'Ring' by a few provincial performances, of which the first is to be at Newcastle, and for which rehearsals have been taking place at Tynemouth. As the Trilogy has not been staged here before, considerable interest has been aroused, and much study and discussion of Wagner are in progress in musical circles. Mr. N. Kilburn, on Friday, April 11, gave, to a crowded and interested audience, a revised version of a lecture delivered to the Literary and Philosophical Society some years ago. Perhaps the committee of this body would have been well advised if they had invited Mr. Kilburn to devote a series of evenings, instead of one, to the subject. During the afternoon of Saturday, April 12, Dr. Richards lectured to the local members of the Royal College of Organists on 'The interpretation of organ music,' and in the evening, Mr. H. V. Dodds, one of the best of our resident organists and an accompanist of a high order, spoke to the members of the Newcastle branch of the Free Church Musicians' Union on 'Organ accompaniments,' and gave many practical examples. The Newcastle Amateur Operatic Society occupied the boards of the Tyne Theatre for the week beginning April 14, and produced 'The Chieftain,' 'Ruddigore,' and 'Box and Cox,' with success.

At the conclusion of a recent rehearsal of the Great Yarmouth Orchestral Society, a presentation was made to Mr. C. W. Moss, who has been conductor and orchestral instructor to the Society for twenty-one years.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

'King Olaf' is in high favour with South Yorkshire choirs. The third of a group of excellent performances of the picturesque cantata was given by the Rotherham Choral Society. The choir was augmented by a large contingent from Doncaster, a return visit following similar help given by the Rotherham singers. The singing possessed all those attributes of verve, dash, and high colouring, which Mr. Thomas Brameld for many years has laboriously cultivated. With a greater range of expressiveness in the tender and devotional choruses the singing would be well-nigh beyond reproach; the dramatic and descriptive portions could not easily be bettered. The orchestra played very safely, and the soloists—Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Dawson Freer—sang with complete success.

The Sheffield Amateur Musical Society reached its own high standard of refined and thoughtful singing and interpretation in a performance at the Spring Concert of Brahms's 'A German Requiem.' A proud tradition of the Society, now on the threshold of its jubilee, is the completeness of its ensemble. To this result the beautiful singing of Miss Carrie Tubb, and Mr. Thorpe Bates, and the polished playing of a fine orchestra, contributed. Mr. J. W. Phillips played organ solos, and the orchestra was heard in 'Danse Macabre' (Saint-Saëns), Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and the 'Tannhäuser' Overture. Miss Tubb in 'Johanna's farewell' (Tchaikovsky) sang with exquisite art, and Mr. Thorpe Bates also sang songs with distinction. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted.

The Sheffield Choral Union, after many ups and downs of fortune, has entered a phase of internal and popular prosperity. The choir, trebled in size in a couple of seasons and infinitely improved in musical qualities, sang in 'Elijah' in a way recalling their memorable concerts of thirty years ago. They excel in the standard oratorios. 'Elijah' found the members in first-rate mood and attainments. Lieut. Suckley conducted, and there was a small, competent orchestra, with Mr. Harold Eaton at the new Victoria Hall organ. The soloists were Miss Eva Rich, Miss Mabel Corran, Mr. Harry Hartley, and Mr. Harry Reynolds.

Excellent choral progress has been reported during the month by the Anston Choral Society (Mr. Edwin Presswood conductor); in Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen'; the Clarion Vocal Union (Mr. W. H. Popplewell) in Boughton's 'A Song of Liberty,' and the Abbeydale Choral Society (Mr. G. A. Seed) in Cowen's 'The Sleeping Beauty.'

The Sheffield Amateur Instrumental Society played with increased confidence and finish at the closing concert, when the 'Eroica' Symphony was the chief work on the programme. The 'Flying Dutchman' Overture found the members at their best, second place in smartness and precision being won in Grainger's 'Mock Morris.' Mr. Collin Smith gave an artistic performance of the solo in Lalo's 'Cello concerto in D minor, and a clever young pianist, Miss Guendolen Roe, played neatly in Saint-Saëns's 'Africa' Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, Mr. Frederick Dawson conducted.

The Senior and Junior sections of the Sheffield Philharmonic Orchestra (amateur) represent another branch of orchestral enthusiasm in the city. Mr. J. H. Parkes directs both, and by a system of drafting promising players into the older body, keeps up a supply of continuously-flowing ability and progress. The Seniors gave a repeat performance, after a lapse of years, of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, but were heard to better satisfaction in Coleridge-Taylor's 'Othello' Suite, which was smartly-played. Crispness and good tone in the strings, and excellent intonation in the wood-wind, marked further progress.

The Juniors are a zealous band and must work conscientiously to secure such promising results. First and second violins total about seventy performers; but in other departments the balance is satisfactory. Godard's 'Suite Gothique' was enthusiastically and, in the main, correctly played. The young musicians also did well in Thomas's 'Raymond' Overture, and German's tone-poem 'Hamlet.'

The Chesterfield Orchestral Society is another flourishing amateur organization. At a concert given in the Memorial Hall, under Mr. J. F. Staton's direction, they showed in many respects qualities not only of finish, but of individual resource.

and expressiveness, especially in the solo wind-parts, which should enable them soon to render a good account of important and extended orchestral works. They played with praiseworthy ensemble in the 'Ballade' from Frederic Cliffe's first Symphony, and showed both power and precision in the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger' and German's 'Welsh Rhapsody.' Miss Katie Bacon, who possesses most of the requisites of good concerto-playing, was the soloist in Schumann's pianoforte concerto. Miss Doris Carter and Mr. Roland Jackson sang ballads.

Easter falling so early, a good many more concerts have been 'left over' than usual. On April 2 the Leeds New Choral Society, an enterprising young Society conducted by Mr. H. M. Turton, gave a more than creditable performance of Elgar's 'Caractacus,' the singing of the choir being characterized by a pleasing freshness and enthusiasm. Madame Shergold and Messrs. Joseph Reed, Coleman, and Freere were the principals. Mr. Turton also appeared as the soloist in Dr. Basil Harwood's Organ concerto, written for the last Gloucester Festival. The peculiar qualities of the Leeds Town Hall organ militated against the effect of the performance, which was conducted by Mr. Julian Clifford. On April 11 Miss Kathleen Frise Smith, a young but already skilled and artistic pianist, gave a recital at which she played among other things MacDowell's 'Eroica' sonata and Busoni's transcription of Bach's well-known Organ fugue in D, with quite remarkable power and incisiveness. On April 9 Miss Kathleen Parlow, the Canadian violinist, with a concert party, made her first appearance at Leeds, and produced a favourable impression. The financial result of the Saturday orchestral concerts has been announced, and is eminently satisfactory, a balance to the good remaining to be handed over to the next season, which is to consist of six concerts. On April 14 the Carl Rosa Company came to Leeds for their annual visit, and introduced two novelties to the town in 'Die Zauberflöte' (which achieved a quite remarkable success, both popular and artistic) and Wolf-Ferrari's 'Jewels of the Madonna.' Both were produced and performed with a completeness that was worthy of this company's best traditions.

At Bradford, the free Chamber Concerts came to a close on March 31, when Pianoforte trios by Mendelssohn (D minor) and Saint-Saëns (F, op. 18) were played by Messrs. F. Mercer, Edgar Drake, and G. S. Drake. Miss Judson was the vocalist, and introduced three of Beethoven's settings of Scottish songs, with their original accompaniment for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. This concert brought to an end the three years' experiment which Mr. Midgley had organized with the help of a few generous music-lovers, and it now remains to be seen what will become of them in the future. It will be a misfortune if such a valuable institution be allowed to drop.

In York, Mr. T. Tertius Noble, who left the city for his New York post last month, has been saying many farewells and conducting his last concerts. On March 26, it was the concert of the York Symphony Orchestra, which introduced Mozart's G minor Symphony and Wieniawski's second Violin concerto (in D minor), the soloist in the latter being Miss Leila Willoughby, a player of great refinement. Mr. Noble has done wonders with the amateurs who form the bulk of his orchestra, and it is pleasant to find that in his successor, Dr. Bairstow, the Society can find a conductor of no less ability, presuming that he will carry on the work.

On April 8 the York Musical Society gave Berlioz's 'Faust,' and this was its conductor's last appearance on the concert-platform at York. With Miss Ina Hill, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Hamilton Harris as an excellent cast of principals, and a well-drilled choir, the work went well.

On April 9, Elgar's latest work, 'The Music Makers,' was introduced by two different Yorkshire Societies. Under Mr. Kilburn (who is always first in the field, and had already given it at Sunderland and Bishop Auckland) it was heard at the concert of the Middlesbrough Musical Union, with Miss Edith Clegg as soloist, Goetz's 'Nænia' and Dvorák's Symphony in G being also included in the programme. The other performance of 'The Music Makers' was by the Wakefield Choral Society, under Mr. Percy Bligh's direction. Miss Gertrude Lonsdale was the soloist, and from the circumstance that in the notices of both these performances there was some complaint that the solo part was obscured by the choir, it may be assumed that the fault does not rest entirely with the executants.

The centre of interest in musical matters has now shifted to Harrogate, where the 'season' began on March 20, and is to continue till October. As usual, at the Symphony concerts on Wednesday afternoons, Mr. Julian Clifford is to bring to a hearing a quantity of interesting orchestral music. Already we have had Glazounoff's fourth Symphony, in E flat, Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and Schubert's 'Unfinished,' and Concertos have been played by Miss Annie Godfrey (Saint-Saëns's 'Rondo Capriccioso' for violin), Mr. James Messaes (Violoncello concerto by Arnold Trowell), and Mr. Isidore Epstein (Paderewski's 'Polish Fantasia'). On April 2, Dr. Markham Lee gave an entertaining lecture on 'Tchaikovsky,' and Messrs. Clifford, J. Lawson, and Messaes played that composer's 'Elegiac' pianoforte trio by way of an illustration. The visit of the Imperial Russian Ballet on March 22 was an event which had for its chief feature Kimsky-Korsakoff's 'Scheherazade,' which, in spite of some unavoidable limitations, was effectively produced. The music, however, received a more adequate interpretation at one of the Symphony Concerts on April 9.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ALSAGER.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was performed on April 9 by the Alsager and District Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Carl Oliver, and in spite of the substitution of pianoforte (Miss Dudson) for orchestral accompaniment, an effective interpretation was given. The choral programme also included German's 'My bonny lass she smileth,' and Elgar's 'As torrents in summer' and 'Weary wind of the west.' The solo singers were Miss Gertie Perry, Mr. Melville Iredale, Mr. J. J. Maltby, and Mr. Harry Vernon.

AMERSHAM.—The Choral Society gave the second concert of their eighth season, in the Town Hall, on Wednesday, March 26, the chief item on the programme being Elgar's 'Banner of St. George.' The Society, though small, gave an excellent performance of this patriotic work, whilst the solo part was artistically sung by Miss May Skinner. Mr. Edward G. Croager conducted and Mr. R. W. Jeffery accompanied.

AYTON, N.B.—Under the direction of Mr. George Allan the Choral Association gave for their ninth season Hiller's 'Song of victory,' and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' (concert selection). The soloist was Miss Dorothy Forster, of Newcastle. A small but efficient string band with pianoforte and harmonium supplied the accompaniments.

BOURNVILLE.—On March 31, the Bournville Works Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Cowen's 'The rose maiden.' The band and choir of 150 performers were conducted by Mr. James Brier, the Works Musical Director. The principals were Misses C. Wheatley, E. Cooper, and Messrs. H. Smith, and H. Simmonds. There was a large and appreciative audience.

BRIGHTON.—The well-known standard of the Sacred Harmonic Society's singing was maintained on April 10, in a performance of Haydn's 'The Creation,' under the direction of Mr. Robert Taylor. The soloists were Madame Lillie Slapofski, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

CANTERBURY.—An exceptionally well-chosen programme was submitted by the East Kent Orchestra on April 17, under the capable direction of Mr. Percy Godfrey. Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Sibelius's 'Valse triste,' a selection from 'Die Meistersinger,' and Mr. Godfrey's 'Vaudeville l'espigle,' were the orchestral numbers, adequately performed by the orchestra of forty-two, among whom were included a contingent from the band of the East Kent Yeomanry. An interesting selection of songs was given by Miss Jenny Taggart.

CARDIFF.—Welsh musicians are again indebted to Mr. Roderick Williams and the Cardiff Harmonic Society for their experiences of Bach's music. A fine performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion was given under these auspices on March 19, in which the spirit as well as the letter of the work was revealed. The solo parts were adequately sung by Miss Dilys Jones, Madame Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Ivor Foster.

CHESHAM.—The Choral Society brought their season to a close on March 27, in the Parish Church, with an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' The choruses were cleanly and artistically sung, with a good quality of tone. The solo parts were taken by Miss Muriel Berry, Miss Nellie Long, Mr. Ernest Penfold, Mr. Courtney, and Mr. Lewis Stroud. A large amount of the success of the performance was due to Mr. Edward G. Croager's careful training and skilful conducting, and the judicious accompaniment of Mr. Welton Hickin.

COALVILLE.—A fine performance of Elgar's 'The music-makers' was given on April 9, by the Coalville Philharmonic Society, assisted by the Loughborough and Quorn Choral Societies, each of whom has been studying the work under Mr. Frank Storer. At the conclusion there was a scene of enthusiasm by the crowded audience such as one seldom hears after a work of this kind, and an eloquent and well-deserved tribute was paid to Mr. Storer for his scholarly interpretation of this difficult work. The choir was also heard in Bach's 'Blessing, glory, and wisdom,' and in the 'Song of the Vikings.' Miss Lysette Mostyn sang the solos with great depth of feeling. In the second part of the programme the orchestra gave Beethoven's 'Prometheus' Overture, Sibelius's 'Valse triste,' and Mozart's E flat Symphony. Two lullabies (MSS.), composed by Mr. Storer, 'Sleep, baby sleep,' and 'I have a heart to call my own,' were sung by Miss Mostyn.

COCKERMOUTH.—The fifty-ninth concert of the Harmonic Society was successfully held on March 26, when the programme consisted of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and a miscellaneous selection. A praiseworthy performance of the cantata was given, the merit of which was due both to the choral singing and to that of the soloists, Madame Sarah Cook, Miss Gertrude Haworth, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Hamilton Harris. Mr. George Tootell (pianist) and Miss F. Stevens (violinist) contributed.

COLCHESTER.—The concert given by the Musical Society on April 17 marked the début of the Society's new conductor, Mr. W. F. Kingdon. He established himself in universal favour by conducting an expressive performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' in which the precision and light and shade of the singing were a tribute to his powers. The solo parts were well taken by Miss Aimée Kemball, Mr. Charles Saunders, and Mr. John Prout. The audience was large and eager to applaud.

DERBY.—A most successful performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' was given by the Derby Choral Union at the Drill Hall on March 14, under the direction of Mr. H. Lyell-Taylor. The chorists acquitted themselves admirably, and the interest of the occasion was heightened by the presence of Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. William Higley, as soloists. The annual concert of the Derby Orpheus Society took place at the Temperance Hall on April 2, when Mr. T. H. Bennett conducted excellent interpretations of a number of glees and part-songs, including Leslie's 'Pibroch of Donuil Dhu,' Dard-Janin's 'Peace and War,' Bantock's 'Down among the dead men' and Dard's 'Nightfall.' The soloists of the concert were Miss Lilian Stiles-Allen (vocalist) and Mr. Arthur Bates (violinist).

EAST GRINSTEAD.—An excellent programme was chosen for the last concert of the East Grinstead Orchestral Society. Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony was the chief number, and a highly satisfactory performance was given under the direction of Mr. N. E. Hope. Other instrumental numbers were Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture and Spohr's second Concerto for two violins and orchestra, played by Miss M. Watts and Miss G. Adams. The other soloists of the occasion were Miss Florence Wilcox and Mr. Alec Mutter (vocalists).

ERDINGTON.—On March 29 the Sutton Coldfield and Erdington Orchestral Society gave their second concert of the season in the Assembly Hall of the Church House, Erdington, when a very enjoyable programme was provided. The orchestral items included Mozart's 'Don Juan' Overture, Dvorák's Suite in D, Jarnefeldt's 'Praeludium,' Scharwenka's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor, and the 'Valse des Fleurs' from Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite. The concert was considered by all to be the finest the Society has ever given. Special mention should be made of the brilliant playing of Mr. Arthur Cooke in the solo part of the Pianoforte concerto. Miss Amy Carter sang Bantock's 'Song of the Genie' and other items in impressive style. Mr. Clarence Raybould conducted.

GRANGETOWN.—On April 2 the Grangetown United Methodist Choir, under the able conductorship of Mr. W. H. Short, gave a concert for the benefit of Mr. W. Marshall Isaacs, at Wood Street Congregational Chapel. The choruses, which included 'Be not afraid' (Mendelssohn), 'Babylon' (Gounod), and 'Worthy is the Lamb' (Handel), were well interpreted.

GRIMSBY.—The Philharmonic Society recently gave a very good performance of Sir Hubert Parry's 'Pied Piper,' under Mr. W. Porter's able conductorship. The programme also included delightful performances by the orchestra of Beethoven's 'Egmont' and Rossini's 'Gazza ladra' Overtures, 'Cello soli by Mr. J. Richardson, songs by Messrs. H. Plevy and H. Ellis, and part-songs by the choir (deservedly much appreciated). Mr. P. Wilson was at the pianoforte. The Orchestral Society's Spring Concert was one of the best they have given. The Symphony was Mendelssohn's 'Italian,' to which were added Mozart's 'Le Nozze' Overture, Weber's 'Euryanthe,' and some shorter works of merit. The vocalist was Miss V. Openshaw. Mr. A. Rosenthal played Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto in C minor. Mr. P. Wilson conducted.

HANLEY.—The Potteries Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Carl Oliver, were heard to advantage in a selection of part-songs that included Bairstow's 'The dawn of song,' German's 'My bonnie lass she smileth,' and Leslie's 'Daylight is fading.' An interesting programme contained contributions by Master Walter Willerton, Miss Phyllis Lett, and Mr. John Collett (vocalists), and Miss Isabel McCullagh (violinist).

HARPENDEN.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'The death of Minnehaha' and Elgar's 'The banner of St. George' were the chief choral works in the programme of a successful concert given by Harpenden Musical Society on April 1. Under Dr. Harold E. Watts's able conductorship the choir showed good tone and attack, and attractive expression. The solo parts were taken by Miss Lorna Stamm and Mr. Herbert Marks. An orchestral suite, 'Three bagatelles,' by Dr. Watts, proved very interesting and popular.

HEREFORD.—The performance of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' by the Hereford Choral Society, under Dr. G. R. Sinclair, on April 1, was especially noteworthy for the excellence of the choral singing. The attack and precision were very good, while the beauty of their phrasing and the purity and richness of tone were noticeable. The solos were entrusted to Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Joan Ashley, Mr. Sydney Coltham, Mr. William Bradford, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The 'Golden Legend' was followed by Elgar's unaccompanied part-song 'As torrents in summer,' and the concert concluded with a fine performance of the Choral March from 'Tannhäuser,' 'Hail bright abode.'

JOHANNESBURG.—The chief features of the concert given by the Choral and Orchestral Society on March 12, were the performance of excerpts from 'Lohengrin,' with Miss Blodwen Hopkins as soloist, and an attractive reading of the Allegro moderato from Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto.

given by Mr. R. B. Lloyd. The purely instrumental numbers included German's, 'Henry VIII.' Dances, Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody,' and Gounod's Overture, 'Mirella.' Mr. F. W. Peters conducted.

KIRKCALDY.—The Musical Society gave their first performance of Elgar's 'Caractacus' on March 19. The soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, Mr. Julien Henry, and Mr. Fletcher Perry. A professional orchestra of thirty-five, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole, supplied the accompaniments. Mr. James Gray presided at the organ, and Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducted.

LARGS, N.B.—Under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Stocks, a performance of Handel's 'Messiah' was given in the Public Hall, on March 12, by the Largs Choral Union. The choir numbered some seventy-voiced, the accompaniments being played by members of the Greenock Orchestral Society. The vocalists were Miss Leisal Wahler, Miss Jean Morris, Mr. John Jamieson, and Mr. Hugh Mitchell. Mr. R. T. Adam presided at the pianoforte.

LEEK (STAFFS).—The Amateur Musical Society gave their 118th concert on April 14, and under the direction of Mr. John Cope gave spirited and attractive interpretations of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and MacCunn's 'The lay of the last minstrel.' The solo parts were well sung by Miss Mary Swailes, Miss Melville Iredale, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Norman Allin. A large audience showed every appreciation.

LEICESTER.—An interesting concert was given by the Holy Trinity Choral Union, under Mr. Vincent Dearden's conductorship, on April 16, the programme consisting of Parry's 'Job' and Elgar's 'The Light of life.' Both works were more than adequately presented, the choral singers showing enthusiasm and good training, and the soloists (Miss Eva Rich, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Montague Whitehead, and Mr. Dawson Freer) performing their duties with ability.

LEITCHWORTH.—Elgar's 'King Olaf' and a miscellaneous selection formed the programme of a concert given by the Philharmonic Society at the Picture Palace on April 16. Mr. H. Gomersall conducted an enthusiastic and creditable performance of the cantata, in which Miss Florence Fleming, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. Herbert Tracey took the solo parts. The programme included Handel's chorus 'Round about the Starry Throne,' Cowen's bridal chorus, 'Tis thy wedding morn,' and Weber's Overture to 'Der Freischütz.' Miss Christine Hicks (violinist) and Miss Dora Petherick (violinist) added solos.

MILFORD-ON-SEA.—On April 2, the Milford Choral Society gave an interesting concert under the direction of Mr. Abdy Williams. The chief number was 'The wraith of Odin,' from Elgar's 'King Olaf.' The remainder of the choral programme consisted of sea canticles and part-songs, the latter including Pearsall's 'Come, let us be merry and make good cheer,' Charles Wood's 'Whispering winds,' Parry's 'Out upon it' and Lee Williams's 'Phyllida flouts me.' There were also a number of solo items.

NORTH WALSHAM.—Two performances of 'Elijah,' one in a shortened version, were given on March 26, by the North Walsham Amateur Musical Society under the direction of Mr. A. S. Wilde. The singing of the choir was on a level with the Society's highest standard. Solo parts were taken by Miss Florence Holderness, Miss Salie Sowerby, Mr. Arthur Kellett, and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

PETERBOROUGH.—An interesting pianoforte recital was given on March 26 by Mr. Viggo Kihl, who carried out an exacting programme to the evident pleasure of a large audience. The chief work in the programme was Beethoven's 'Waldstein' sonata.

ST. HELENS.—Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' was recently performed with success by the Choral Society under the direction of Mr. T. V. Hurst. A highly creditable interpretation of the work was given by the choir (assisted by members of Madame Bouffier's Ladies' Choir from Liverpool) and by the soloists—Miss Beatrice Miranda, Miss Maud Holmes, Signor Piero Gherardi, and Mr. Hebden Foster.

SIDCUP.—Fletcher's 'The Deacon's masterpiece' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' formed the chief work of the Sidcup Choral and Orchestral Society at King's Hall on April 1. Some excellent singing was heard under the direction of Mr. C. W. Wilson; the humour and sentiment of the two works were well portrayed. The independent orchestral numbers were Cherubini's 'Anacreon' Overture, and an excerpt from Delibes's 'Coppelia.' The soloists were Miss Dorothy Gandy, Miss Marion Battishill, Mr. Walter Glynne, and Mr. Reginald Yates (vocalists), and Miss Hilda Starbruck, a highly capable pianist.

SITTINGBOURNE.—The Sittingbourne and District Musical Society, consisting of a choir and orchestra of ninety performers, under the direction of Mr. W. J. Keech, gave a successful concert on April 9. Haydn's 'Spring' and Gounod's 'Faust' (concert selection) were performed with good effect, to which the efforts of both choir and soloists (Miss Clytie Hine, Miss Ethel Toms, Mr. Joseph Boddy, and Mr. W. Toplis Green) contributed. Between the two choral works Mendelssohn's 'Cornelius' Overture was played.

SKEGNESS.—On March 27 the eleventh annual concert of the Musical Society was held under the direction of Mr. Siegfried Richter, who conducted praiseworthy performances of Gounod's 'Faust' (concert selection) and Elgar's 'The banner of St. George.' The solo parts were taken by Miss Alice Hare, Miss D. M. Pannell, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. Owen Price.

SOUTHBOROUGH.—An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was given by the Southborough Musical Society at the Victoria Hall on March 31, under the conductorship of Mr. G. A. Boulter, before a large audience. The chief soloists were Miss Mabel Whitehouse and Mr. George Foxon, who both sang splendidly, and the choruses were also admirably given. Mr. Rowsby Woof ably led the orchestra, and also played two violin solos with fine effect in a miscellaneous programme which followed the cantata. The concert proved a decided artistic and financial success, and places the status of the Society beyond question.

SWANSEA.—A programme of unusual interest was presented by the Swansea and District Male Choir on April 21 at the Albert Hall, Swansea. The special feature was Mendelssohn's 'Antigone,' which was performed with the assistance of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under the direction of Sir Henry Wood. The influence of the distinguished conductor was felt throughout the whole performance. The version of the play abridged for concert performance by Mr. Charles Fry, was recited with great dramatic power by him, and Mr. Emil Leslie displayed a voice of great sympathy and tenderness. The bass solos were sung by Mr. Llewellyn Bowen, who has trained the choir with much skill and patience. The programme included Beethoven's C minor Symphony. The choir were heard to great advantage in the chorus, 'The Nun of Nidaros,' by Dr. Daniel Protheroe, in which they displayed splendid tone and power. The concert was the first of a series given at the South Wales Musical Festival, the remainder of which will be described in our next issue.

TORONTO.—Much fame and esteem has lately accrued to the National Chorus (conducted by Dr. Albert Ham) from the success of the concerts given at Toronto and Buffalo in conjunction with the New York Symphony Orchestra. The fine qualities of tone and expressive power achieved by this choir of 200 voices under the inspiration of Dr. Ham's knowledge and insight into choral matters were conspicuously shown in interpretations of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Sea-drift,' Max Bruch's 'Morning song of praise,' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' that earned universal admiration.

TRING.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was successfully performed by the Choral Society on April 7, under the able direction of Mr. G. W. Hedges. There was much expressiveness in the choral interpretation, and an attractive quality of tone. The solo parts were well undertaken by Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Grace Ivell, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Herbert Hedges, all of whom contributed to a miscellaneous second half.

TROWBRIDGE.—An admirable performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' was given recently by the Philharmonic Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. Cyril Weigall. The large share of the choral work that falls to the male voices was carried out with ability and excellent effect. The solo portions were well interpreted by Miss Christine Bywater, Mr. Gwilym Richards, Dr. Sydney Cole, and Mr. Charles Tree.

WORTHING.—On April 2, at the Kursaal, Mr. Horace A. Hawkins gave a farewell concert, previous to taking up his duties as organist at St. George's Church, Paris. An illuminated address and a silver candelabra were presented to him by the past and present members of his Symphony Orchestra. Dr. W. Prendergast, organist of Winchester Cathedral, and Mr. Hawkins were the conductors. An interesting programme included Bizet's first Suite 'L'Arlesienne,' and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. The vocalists were Miss May Osborn, Mrs. Wiggins, and Signor Carlos Ronzevalle. The orchestra comprised upwards of seventy performers.

Paderewski has given two enormously successful recitals. He afterwards magnanimously presented the receipts (£1,000) to the funds of the Society of Polish artists and journalists.

Miscellaneous.

On Sunday, May 4, the Music Club will celebrate the centenary of Wagner's birth by a reception and a concert of unusual interest. Herr Nikisch has generously consented to conduct a performance of the 'Siegfried Idyll' by an orchestra of seventeen performers, that being the exact number which took part in the first performance at Wagner's villa at Triebtschen on the Lake of Lucerne, in 1871. As far as is known only one similar performance has ever taken place in London. Madame Kirkby Lunn will sing, and Mr. Harold Bauer will play. The meeting on Sunday, June 1, will take the form of a reception to M. Saint-Saëns, and this will be the first public function in which he will take part during his jubilee visit to London. The membership of the Club is now 400, and the committee has decided after July 1 to raise the subscription.

The following awards have been made as a result of the recent examinations at Trinity College of Music: Scholarships (tenable for one year) to Aloysius Edward Bolton, organ; Irene Grace Evans, pianoforte; Albert Martin Hawkins, organ; Alice Lilian L. Hawkins, pianoforte; Isobel Radford, singing; Winifred H. Regensburg, violin. Free tuition for one year to Margaret Ellen Gibson, singing; Dorothy I. Meallin, violin; Eva Scarrott Pocock, singing; John H. Silvester, double-bass; Robert Abraham Strong, singing; Kathleen E. M. Day, singing.

At the Holborn Restaurant, on April 19, the thirty-fourth annual dinner of the South London Musical Club was held, with Mr. W. Johnson Galloway, hon. director of the Great Eastern Railway Musical Society, as chairman. The musical entertainment after the dinner consisted of some of the best choral numbers in the Club's repertoire, well sung by the choir, under the direction of Mr. H. L. Balfour. The Club's pianist, Mr. William Every, was as usual a most efficient accompanist.

At a recent competition for close scholarships at the Royal College of Music, the following awards were made:—The Kent Scholarship to Marie L. Johnson, pianoforte; the Heywood-Lonsdale (Shropshire) Scholarship to David Finney, violin; the S. Ernest Palmer (Berkshire) Scholarship to Gertrude Higgs, singing; the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society Scholarship to Thelma F. Dandridge, violoncello; the Bristol Scholarship to Sobina W. Green, pianoforte.

We are informed that for the great Congregational Demonstration in connection with the closing of the Central Fund, to be held in the Royal Albert Hall on May 8, a choir of 1,000 voices has been got together from London Congregational Choirs. The music will include 'Thanks be to God' and 'Be not afraid' (from 'Elijah'), 'Unfold, ye portals everlasting' (from 'The Redemption'), and the 'Hallelujah Chorus.' The organist is Mr. Horace G. Holmes, and Mr. Leonard H. Snow is the conductor.

'The development of the flute' was the subject of an excellent lecture given by Mr. Edward de Jong on April 12, before a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Morley Hall, Hanover Square.

A Wagner Centenary concert will be given at the Albert Hall on May 22. The London Symphony Orchestra will play, Herr Mengelberg will conduct, and Mr. John Coates will sing.

Answers to Correspondents.

L. M. WALSH.—The distinction is one of timbre rather than one of range. Your range is that of a baritone, and from your other particulars it would seem that your voice is baritone. Why aim at adding to your compass upper notes that will probably remain an affliction to yourself and your audience? There is slightly more credit in being a good tenor than in being a good baritone, but on account of the rarity more than the virtue of the phenomenon.

L. L.—A sketch of Mr. Ernest Fanelli's life and work was given in our issue for April, 1912. We were not privileged to hear the recent performance of his 'Tableaux Symphoniques' by the Colonne Orchestra.

SIGHT-READER.—We certainly uphold the Tonic Sol-fa system as an aid to sight-reading, not merely because of its own attributes as a notation, but because it is a short cut to the Staff notation for singers.

CRAYON.—We are unable and unwilling to express any opinion on the matter. You must discreetly obtain local information.

REMARKABLE WORK ON MUSIC EDUCATION.

WRITTEN BY FAMOUS EXPERTS.

THAT Wonderful Book, the MUSICAL EDUCATOR, seems this season to be entering upon a new lease of life. As our readers know, its aim is to supply in interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

PADEREWSKI,

"On the best way to study the Piano."

"The Piano and how to play it."

"On the cultivation of the voice."

EDWIN H. LEMARE,

"The Art of Organ Playing."

MADAME MARCHESI,

"The Teaching of Singing."

JOHN DUNN,

"On Playing the Violin."

SIR F. H. COWEN,

"The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE writes:

"The Musical Educator" is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRÉSER, Mus. D. Oxon., F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

A REMARKABLE WORK FOR MUSIC LOVERS

THE STORIES AND WORKS OF THE GREAT COMPOSERS.

"FAMOUS Composers" is the first work to provide in a satisfactory form a presentment of the lives of all the great composers who have enriched the world with their gifts. The sublime compositions of the great musicians can never be fully appreciated or understood without a sympathetic knowledge of their lives, their times, and their temperaments. For that reason alone this work is indispensable to all real lovers of music, for in the pages of "Famous Composers" will be found biographies of all the great Immortals written by authorities possessing not only the literary skill, but also that spark of genius that lifts the work above the ordinary plane of critical analysis.

The Original Scores Reproduced.

Moreover the work is greatly enriched by the inclusion of examples of facsimile manuscripts of these great composers and their immortal works. Here will be found examples of the original score of Handel's "Messiah," Bach's Prelude to one of his massive Chorals, of Beethoven's tender Sonatas, Chopin's Prelude in D, the weird melodies of Dvorák, Haydn's original manuscript for the Austrian Hymn, Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," Mendelssohn's Melodies as they left the hand of the great composer, and a host of others; in short, never before has such a mass of rare and hitherto unpublished manuscripts been brought together within the compass of a single work. Among them are included facsimiles of music by Auber, Bach, Balfe, Beethoven, Bellini, Bizet, Boieldieu, Brahms, Bruch, Cherubini, Donizetti, Dvorák, Franz, Gade, Gluck, Gounod, Grétry, Grieg, Halévy, Handel, Haydn, Hérold, Liszt, Marschner, Massenet, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mozart, Pergolesi, Purcell, Raff, Rameau, Rheinberger, Rossini, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Scarlatti, Schubert, Schumann, Sgambati, Spohr, Spontini, Strauss, Sullivan, Thomas, Tschalkowsky, Verdi, Wagner, Weber, &c.

CRITICISM.

In addition to the biographies, the work includes a scholarly criticism of the works of the great composers, its influence and bearing on the development of the particular school represented, and an analytical summary of the great works which have made their names famous. An immense amount of study and research among private papers and documents, original scores, letters and portraits, has shed new lights on their lives, and much that is interesting regarding their illustrious contemporaries.

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plain-song and Medieval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plain-song, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plain-song. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plain-song during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

AN OPERETTA FOR UNISON SINGING.

"Mr. Gaul has been particularly happy in infusing the Norse spirit into that portion of his music which deals with goblin life in Norway. When the goblins become visitors in fairyland, the character of the music changes; lightness is its predominant feature, perhaps the choicest fragment being a fairy dance. This latter, together with a very characteristic dance of elves and a shadow dance, were beautifully executed."—Birmingham Gazette.

TOILERS OF THE DEEP

CANTATA FOR FEMALE VOICES.

"The musical settings are twelve in number, the part-writing for first and second sopranos and contraltos. The utmost care and finish has been bestowed in wedding appropriate music to the verse, and Mr. Gaul has written nothing finer, nor more melodious and captivating in this branch of composition specially adapted for High Schools for Girls. . . . Taking the cantata as a whole, it is a delightful work, replete with artistic workmanship, and, above all, melodious and expressive."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY

JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—X.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simons, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

TECHNIQUE

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY
ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, The Royal College of Organists, and The College of Preceptors. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

COMPOSED BY

J. A. O'NEILL.

IN TWO BOOKS:

Price Two Shillings each.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

THE CHOIRBOY'S GUIDE TO THE CATHEDRAL PSALTER.EDITED AND ARRANGED BY ERNEST NEWTON, M.A.

This little book has been compiled mainly for the use of choirboys, and, therefore, nothing has been inserted but what is absolutely necessary for understanding the pointing of the Psalms as arranged in the Cathedral Psalter.

A certain amount of information has been given for the guidance of the Choirmaster, but the principal part of the book consists in the sets of exercises which have been arranged to lead the choirboys, step by step, through the various divisions of syllables that occur in the chanting of the Psalms.

After careful examination of the Cathedral Psalter, it has been found that there are exactly fifteen ways of dividing these syllables. All the exercises have been taken from this Psalter.

The author has thoroughly tested the advantages to be gained by the use of this methodical arrangement of the exercises, and is therefore in a position to say that by the use of them a very considerable amount of time can be saved in teaching choirboys to understand the pointing of the Psalms.

As the Recitation Notes are well within the compass of Alto, Tenor, and Bass voices, the book can be used with equal advantage by all members of a choir.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

Competition Festival Record

No. 58.

Our June issue will be specially enlarged in order that reports may be given of the numerous Festivals held late in April (with which we regret we are unable to deal in our present issue), and others, including Morecambe (May 1-3) and Birmingham (May 20-24), to be held during May.

THE ASSOCIATION OF COMPETITION FESTIVALS ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Council Meeting and Conference of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals will be held in the University Hall, Leeds, on Friday and Saturday, June 27 and 28. The programme announced, subject to alteration, is as follows:

FRIDAY, JUNE 27.

- 11 a.m. 'Objects of the Association and Review of Festival Competition Work.'
By Lady Mary Trefusis and Dr. W. G. McNaught.
- 11.30 a.m. 'Choice of music for Competition.'
By Dr. W. H. Hadow.
- 12 a.m. 'Local effects of Festivals.'
By Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland.
- 2.30 p.m. 'Money prizes.'
By Mr. Herbert Thompson.
- 3 p.m. 'Instrumental music in Competitions.'
By Mr. Fricker.
- 3.30 p.m. 'Church and Chapel choirs in town and village in relation to the Festival Movement.'
By Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson.

SATURDAY, JUNE 28.

- 10 a.m. 'Some points in a school singing lesson.'
By Mr. W. Godson.
Illustrated by a Class of Boys from Quarry Mount Council School. Teacher, Mr. H. Exley. In addition three school choirs will each render two items.
- 11 a.m. 'Choice of music for schools and the importance of sight-reading for children.'
- 11.30 a.m. 'Technique of conducting.'
By Dr. Bairstow and Mr. Harry Evans.
- 12.15 p.m. 'Folk-songs and Dances' (with illustrations).
By Mr. Cecil Sharp.

It is hoped that a rehearsal of the Leeds Festival Chorus may possibly take place on June 28, and members of the Conference may be invited to attend.

Address of Acting Secretary.—Miss E. Maddock, 12, Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C.

AN ADJUDICATOR'S TOUR.

As it is impossible to give a full report of the numerous competitions that have taken place recently, I propose to give some brief general remarks on the Festivals with which I have been personally concerned as an adjudicator.

WEST HARTLEPOOL.—March 25.

It says much for the musical interest of the inhabitants of this town of workers, that so many elected to spend their Bank Holiday in listening to music or competing in the commodious Town Hall. Junior solos, vocal and instrumental, occupied the morning, and brought forward some good talent. The school choir singing was also satisfactory, the Galley's Field children especially showing skilful training. Elwick Road also excelled in one class. There were about fifty adult soloists who battled with:

Soprano—'So shall the lute' (Handel).
Contralto—'Thou shalt bring them in' (Handel).
Tenor—'Be thou faithful' (Mendelssohn).
Bass—'Young Dietrich' (Henschel).

The chief interest of the event was, however, the male-voice choir class. The stipulated test was Blumenthal's effective and virtuosic part-song 'What care I how fair she be' and an 'own-choice' piece. Never anywhere have I heard finer male-voice choirs. The vehemence and dramatic intensity of expression, splendid equipment, tone, and practically perfect technique displayed, made the occasion memorable.

Cleveland Harmonic came out first, but only a shade in front of the Excelsior Male-Voice Choir. The arrangements for the day were admirably carried out, under the guidance of the hon. secretary, Mr. T. J. Bryant.

OAKHAM (RUTLAND).—April 2, 3.

This Festival was originated by the Hon. Lady Charles Fitzwilliam (who resides in Oakham), and has since been carried on by an influential committee of residents. The Dowager Countess of Ancaster takes a lively interest in the event. The appeal is mainly to the surrounding villages. Only choirs junior and senior are catered for. Nine villages sent school choirs and twelve villages adult choirs. In no other countryside centre is more useful work being accomplished. The lively interest of the troops of children and villagers, some of whom come from distant parts by road, was refreshing. All the musical work showed painstaking preparation, and a great deal of it was excellent. Altogether the steady progress made here was an object-lesson in the educational value of the Festival. The juniors sang collectively after the competition. The Somersetshire song, 'Dashing away with the smoothing iron,' with its obvious melody and irresistible swing of rhythm, was greatly enjoyed by the audience and performers.

In the Madrigal Section, in which the test was Morley's 'April is in my mistress's face,' Ridlington sang very well indeed and gained a first place. In the Anthem Class, the Oakham Church Choir, under Mr. Nicholson, gave a beautiful performance of S. S. Wesley's impressive anthem 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace,' and were awarded the first prize. Seven choirs sang in this section. In the chief choral class some really excellent choir training was exhibited. The tests were 'On Jordan's banks' (Max Bruch) and 'Chorus of shepherds' (Schubert). The Oakham Choir again was first, but Uppingham, Wing, Langham, and Whissendine were very close behind. Ten choirs competed.

In the female-voice choir class there were seven competitors, and Exton, under Lady Norah Noel, was first. The test was Dr. Walford Davies's trio 'The Lamb.' A successful evening concert was given, at which the combined adult choirs sang under the direction of Mr. R. Sterndale Bennett, the music-master of the famous Uppingham School.

WEST SUSSEX (CHICHESTER).—April 4, 5.

This is a new Festival, the outcome of much personal attention by the Duchess of Norfolk (Arundel Castle), who is the President of the Association of Competition Festivals. Chichester was chosen as a centre because it rejoices in the possession of a good hall. The first day was devoted to town and village choirs. The following places were represented: Arundel, Worthing, Chichester, Horsham, Bognor, Bignor, Boxgrove, Bury, Eastergate, Lancing, Lower Beeding, Poling, Lyminster, Rustington, Sidlesham, Warnham, Pulborough, Burpham, Woolbeding, Fittleworth, Grafton and East Lavington, Lodsworth and Rackham.

Chichester Bishop Otter College, under Mr. F. W. Crowe (the Cathedral organist), was very successful in the female-voice choir section, as were other choirs under the same conductor. Ten village choirs sang Smart's 'A song for the seasons' and Rustington Parish Choir came out first, Lower Beeding Choral Society second, and Eastergate Musical Society third. An evening concert by the combined choirs drew a large audience. Miss Ada Forrest was the soloist.

On the second day the schools competed, and the hall presented an animated appearance all day long. In the 'under 400 average attendance' class, the Chichester Central Girls' School sang with exceptional charm, and in another section Arundel Church of England School showed the very best training. In the smaller school sections there were nine entries; the Arundel St. Philip's Girls' School distinguished themselves greatly, and in another small-school class in which there were ten entries, Rackham Mixed School was slightly ahead of Pulborough North Heath School. In the Secondary School Class there were seven entries, and the Worthing Girls' County High School gained the first place.

The combined schools sang together at the end of the competition.

The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk attended throughout both days and displayed great interest in the proceedings. Mr. Crowe actively assisted in the arrangements.

BOURNE (LINCOLNSHIRE).—April 8, 9.

Lincolnshire has not had the reputation for musical capacity that it deserves. It is not uncommon to hear local residents declare that the county is a sterile field for the cultivation of music. But the experiences of the competition Festivals held at Brigg, Spilsby, Gainsborough, Bourne, and Grantham, have dissipated this uncomfortable assumption. It seems clear that the people have quite average capacity, when they are properly guided by skilful teachers and stimulated by a definite and practicable object. The Bourne event was originated by the present Dowager Countess of Ancaster. It was suspended in 1912, and this year has taken a new lease of life. Miss Bell is the secretary, and she and her brother, Major Bell, are amongst the most persevering and able missionaries of the cause in the district. The programme for the two days listed the names of ten villages or small towns that took part in the Festival. It also very significantly listed the names of thirty-one villages that were not represented, but which are included in the area appealed to by the scheme. But it is too much to expect that at every Festival every village should send in choirs. As it was there was plenty to fill the time during the two days. Altogether there were 120 entries. Both choirs and soloists were catered for.

The tests for the soloists were as follows:—Soprano, 'The lass with the delicate air' (Arne); mezzo-soprano, 'A summer night' (Goring Thomas); contralto, 'The enchantress' (Haddon); tenor, 'Where'er you walk' (Handel); baritone, 'Pilgrim's song' (Tchaikovsky); bass, 'O ruddier than the cherry' (Handel). The Folkingham Church Choir (boys and men) gave a capital performance of 'O give thanks unto the Lord' (Wolstenholme), and the Bourne Abbey

Choir showed capacity and good training in 'Be glad then, ye children of Zion' (Hollins). The Bourne Institute Choir was among the most successful in various classes. It was courageous to put down as a test Mr. McEwen's setting of 'Allen-a-Dale,' but three choirs, Bourne (Mr. Leary), Billingham, and Bourne Institute grappled very bravely with its difficulties and emerged in the order named. Vocal quartets and trios were much in evidence. The school singing showed that the teachers in this district are learning the art of voice-production and choir-training. No doubt they have been greatly helped in these matters by the visits of Miss Margaret Nicholls (Leyton), who during the winter lectured in Bourne to large audiences. A concert on the evening of the second day concluded the proceedings. The prizes were distributed by the Countess of Ancaster.

THE WEST LINDSEY MUSICAL FESTIVAL (GAINSBOROUGH).—April 16, 17.

This very successful event is in its second year. It is the fruit of the labours of the Hon. Mrs. Sandars, an accomplished amateur musician who resides near the town. The entries were very satisfactory, although some had to withdraw owing to illness. Fifteen schools were represented on the junior day. The tests had been very well selected. In one class for unison singing, six schools sang 'By dimpled brook' (Arne) and the action-song 'Manners' (Fletcher). All the performances were good, and some were up to the highest standard to be heard anywhere in the kingdom. The Beckingham Council School (Mr. W. Arthur) sang almost perfectly, and gained 193 marks out of 200. Morton Church of England School (Mr. N. Bradbury) gave such a wonderful performance of the action-song that I felt compelled to award them full marks. Almost equally good performances were given by Gainsborough Parish Church and Ropery Road Council School. It was not that here and there a school sang well, but that the general average was so high.

A children's concert wound up this section of the Festival. On the same evening there were adult solo-singing classes, and a quartet for strings led by Miss G. MacRae, and it was stated that all the players had 'Strauss.' The test was Beethoven's Quartet No. 4, in C minor, Op. 18. It was a difficult test, but it was quite well played. For the second day entries had been received from thirteen places, and villagers trooped in to sing quartets, female-voice trios, male-voice pieces, and mixed-voice part-songs. In addition, all the principal choirs had learned 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' and had to submit to be tested by a selection from that work. Gate Burton did excellently in the female-voice trio class, as well as in the class for large villages, in which the tests were Macfarren's 'Sands of Dee' and the 'Hiawatha' selection. The Gainsborough Choral Society gave a fine performance of Leslie's 'Lullaby of Life' and Edward German's 'My bonny lass.' Other noteworthy classes were those for Church choirs, in which St. John's Church and the Wesleyan Choir, both of Gainsborough, showed first-class training.

The concert was remarkably successful in every way. The large hall was crammed, and many were turned away. Coleridge-Taylor's work received every possible justice, especially as Mr. Gervase Elwes sang the tenor solo. Miss Marjorie Hayward played violin solos in her best style, and the Rev. C. H. Scott, a very competent musician, conducted.

BELFAST.—April 11, 12.

This Festival does not expand very much, but it is evidently doing useful work. It was held in the great Ulster Hall, an arena that affords ample convenience for the handling of numerous choirs. The classes of the competition ranged over a wide field, and included one for string quartets, which was supported by four entries. The first movement of a Quartet by Mozart in G was the test. Miss Harpur's party played admirably and gained the first place. In the girls' solo class, Miss L. Mulligan was the best of eleven competitors. The test was 'The little sandman' (Brahms), from the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW. There were three entries for Warehouse and Shop Choirs; two for Factory Choirs (female voices); one for similar choirs that had not won a prize, and two Band of Hope choirs. Baird's Jubilee Choral Society, York Street Flax Spinning Company, Mrs. Whale's Choir, and Great Victoria Street Band of Hope were all successful in their various classes. On the second day the competition began at 10.30 a.m. and went on until nearly 11 p.m., with only a short cessation. There were country choirs, adult solo-singing, girls' clubs, female-voice choirs, and mixed-voice choirs, all of various grades. Some of the girls' club work was remarkably good. The Elmwood girls, under Miss Roddie, achieved distinction. A local professional teacher, Mrs. Whale, brought in many well-trained choirs, and gained several trophies. In the chief 'open' mixed-voice choir class the tests were 'O peaceful night' (German)—(an arrangement of the original male-voice part-song)—and 'And the glory of the Lord,' from 'Messiah.' There were five entries. The first place was secured by High Street (Hollywood) Guild Musical Society (Mr. R. H. Erskine), but Albertbridge (Mr. J. H. Gleave) and Manor Choral Society were very little behind.

The hon. secretary of the Festival was Miss Beck, and the assistant was Mr. D. S. Kerr. All the arrangements worked smoothly. Much of the success of the event was due to Prof. Morton, the honorary treasurer.

Notices of the North Northamptonshire (Oundle), April 18, 19; the Bath, April 22, 23, 24, and other Festivals held during April are held over till our next issue. W. G. McNAUGHT.

ECCLÉS.—March 21.

The ninth annual Eisteddfod, promoted by the United Welsh here, attracted a crowded audience in the Town Hall on Good Friday. Included in the programme were juvenile and adult vocal and pianoforte competitions, duets, quartets, and recitation contests, and three choral classes. In that for Children's Choirs the first place was taken by Kirmanshulme Juvenile (Mr. Frank Owen). Leigh Primitive Methodist Church (Mr. James Hudson) were first out of five mixed-voice choirs, and Cambria Male-Voice, Eccles (Mr. Llewellyn Hughes) out of three male-voice choirs.

Mr. Josef E. Jones (Conway) and Mr. W. P. Redmayne (Manchester) acted as adjudicators.

DOUGLAS (THE MANX FESTIVAL).

April 1, 2, 3.

On all sides it is reported that this year's Manx Festival exceeded all previous Festivals in extent, competitive interest, and musical value. Many of the test-pieces represented a high standard of difficulty, and their interpretation was of the kind that has made the musical resources of the Isle of Man famous. The chief tests, entries, and results in the choral sections were as follows:

The adjudicators were Mr. H. A. Fricker, Dr. E. C. Birstow, and Mr. Frederick Dawson. Mrs. Laughton (Ballaquane, Peel) is the hon. secretary.

CORNWALL COUNTY FESTIVAL.

April 10, 11, 14, 15.

The general opinion expressed at the fourth Festival of the Cornwall County Music Competitions was that the movement shows definite progress in numbers and standard each year, and that its influence was being proved by a growth of musical Societies in remote districts, a raising of the standard of ideals and of performances, and a spread of knowledge of music of good class. The music given for preparation was well chosen, but in some cases was ambitious. 'Lauda Sion' was required for combined choral singing in the classes for towns and villages, but a more difficult task was given to those from larger centres in Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' the demands of which were by no means fulfilled. Lady Mary Trefusis personally organized and directed the proceedings, and the adjudicators were Dr. Walford Davies and Dr. Percy Buck.

The first-class certificates were given to those obtaining 80 per cent.; second class to those obtaining 65 per cent., and 50 per cent. entitled to a third-class certificate. In many classes a banner or shield was offered for the highest aggregate, sight-reading being essential. The chief results were as follows:

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (Sight-reading).

Unison.—Fowey Boys, 90; Padstow Girls, 80; Penryn Boys' Church Schools, 84; Kelynack and Camborne Troon, 82; Madron Daniel Girls, and Mylor, 80; Probus, 77; Mullion, 76; Penzance St. Mary's, and Truro Bosvigo, 75; Heamoor and Truro Chybelah, 72.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (Singing).

Unison-singing.—Ludgvan, 84; Probus, 81.
Part-singing.—Heamoor, 81; St. Dennis, Penryn Church School, Camborne Troon, and Camborne Basset Road, 80; Fowey Boys, 79; Fowey Girls, 78; Bodmin Boys, 74; Truro Practising School, 78; Falmouth Wellington Terrace, 71; Truro Bosvigo, 74; Helston Boys, 72; Penzance, St. Mary's, 70; Mylor, 69; Falmouth Clare Terrace, and Camborne Roskear Boys, 76; Penzance, St. Paul's, 74; Redruth, Trewrigie, 71; Hayle Penpol, 69; St. Hilary, 65.

SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

Part- and sight-singing.—Boys—Truro College (Petheside Shield), 82. Girls—Penzance West Cornwall College, 87, and Truro High School, 80. The Corfe Shield was won by Truro High School, and the Vinter Shield by St. Austell (mixed) School, for the highest aggregate of marks for part- and sight-singing.

Sight-reading.—Truro County, and Truro High Schools, 75.

OTHER RESULTS.

Orchestral playing, one entry.—Redruth Wesley Y.M.B.C., 73.

Vocal quartets.—St. Ives, 72.

Men's choirs.—Gunnislake, 73; Devoran, 67; St. Stephen's, 65; Land's End, 74; St. Day, 71; Germoe, 67.

Choral Societies.—Anthems: Truro Wesley Choir, 82; Penryn, 78; St. Austell, 68; Sticker, 74; St. Stephen's, 73; Fowey Wesley Choir, 70.

Madrigals.—St. Day, 80; Land's End, 75; St. Feock, 79; Truro Philharmonic, 79; Bodmin Philharmonic, 76.

Accompaniment.—Mr. C. Faulkner Mutton (Torpoint), 81; and Miss G. Carling (Truro), 80.

Men's choirs.—Devoran, 70.

Choral Societies.—Land's End, 70; Fowey Wesley.

HEXHAM (TYNEDALE).—April 12.

Mr. Harry Evans was the adjudicator in a successful day's competition which covered the usual ground of juvenile and adult choral singing. His chief awards were made to the following choirs:—Haltwhistle Vocal Union (female voices), Stockfield Baptist Church Choir, Haltwhistle Assembly Mission, Chopwell Male-Voice Choir, Prudhoe Wesleyan Church Choir (sight-reading), Allendale (small choral Societies) and Acomb and District Choral Society (large choral Societies). In the last-mentioned class the tests were Berlioz's 'Thou must leave Thy lowly dwelling' and Parry's 'Come, pretty wag, and sing.'

KIDDERMINSTER.—April 15-19.

The 'Worcestershire Competitions,' held at Kidderminster for the second time, have so far advanced in scope and popularity that they occupied four days and the attention of four adjudicators.—Dr. R. R. Terry, Dr. Walford Davies, Mr. S. Filmer Rook, and, for composition, Mr. Ernest Newman.

In the competitions for club and factory choirs, the chief prizes were taken by St. John's Female-Voice Choir (Kidderminster), Halesowen Adult School Male Choir, and Fownes' Works Choral Society (Worcester).

The chief choral events were well attended by both public and competitors. In those for choirs of ladies' and boys' voices Newland Choir, boys (Mr. Claud Biggs) and Astwood Bank Ladies' Choir (Mr. A. Hodges) won the first places. Holly Mount Church Choir (Mr. Jones) were the best of three choirs from places of worship; Cotteridge (Mr. Walker) the best of three male-voice choirs. In a competition for plain-song, Dr. Terry awarded the prize to St. Leonard's, Newland. Hubert Bath's 'Spring wind' was imposed as the chief mixed-voice test. It proved over-exacting, but Kidderminster Choral Society (Mr. Glove) gave a very creditable interpretation that gained them the first place.

The chief awards in the Junior Competitions were made to Lea Street Girls (Miss Young), St. James's, West Malvern (Miss Burston), and St. George's Girls (Miss Horton). This section concluded with a combined performance of Rathbone's 'Vogelweid the Minnesinger,' under Mr. Filmer Rook's direction.

ASHBOURNE (DOVE AND CHURNET VALLEYS).

The competitions for village choirs were heard at this village on April 17, Mr. W. McNaught, jun., being the adjudicator. In the juvenile classes, Norbury, Ashbourne Girls, and Ashbourne Cecilia, won the chief prizes, and among the adult choirs Stelston achieved the greatest number of successes. Miss F. Llewellyn (soprano) and Mr. A. R. Fairclough (bass) were the best of the solo singers.

ALDERLEY EDGE.—April 18, 19.

The third musical Festival on a large scale held in this pretty Cheshire village proved a successful one from every point of view, evoking as it did great enthusiasm, keen competitions, and a record number of entries.

The test-pieces and prize-winners in the three choral classes were as follows:

FEMALE CHOIRS (Local).

Test: 'May bells and the flowers' (Mendelssohn).

1st. Alderley Edge Girl Guides' Choir B (Mr. T. B. Bridge).

2nd. Alderley Edge Girls' Club (Miss A. Miller).

VILLAGE CHOIRS (Local).

Test: 'Song for twilight' (C. H. Fogg).

1st. Wilmslow Wesleyan Church (M. Nanney).

2nd. Handforth Church Choir (E. Harris).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

Test: 'Evening' (L. de Call).

1st. Talke Glee Singers (Mr. F. J. Bosson).

2nd. Longsight Male-Voice Glee Club (Mr. G. Crimes).

The adjudicators were Mr. R. H. Wilson, Mr. E. J. Cunnah, Dr. T. Keighley, and Miss Lilian M. Tipping.

ILKLEY (WHARFEDALE).—April 18, 19.

An interesting two-days' competition was held, with Dr. Percy Buck as adjudicator. Some good results were obtained. The tests in the chief choral class were Brahms's 'In Autumn' and Balfour-Gardiner's 'Cargoes.' The result was as follows:

CHORAL SOCIETIES (all villages).

	Marks.
1st. Burley-in-Wharfedale (Mr. J. F. P. Drake) ...	72
2nd. Pool Choral Union (Mr. E. A. Midgley) ...	52

In other choral classes the following were the results:

YORK.—April 19, 21, 22.

The support given to the open classes in this Festival was not satisfactory, and a proposal is on foot to hold this section in the Autumn, when there are fewer rival competitions. The village classes, however, were well attended, and yielded some excellent results. The adjudicator was Mr. Harry Evans, who awarded the chief prizes to the following choirs:

Large Village Schools.—Naburn (Mr. H. Calvert).

Town Schools.—Church Square, Harrogate, and Poppleton Road C.S.

Village Challenge Cup—1st, Wykeham; 2nd, Monk Fryston.

Female-Voice Choirs.—Honesty Girls' Club, and, in the open class, York Ladies' Glee Club.

Male-Voice Choirs.—York.

Mixed-Voice Choirs.—York Co-operative Choir.

A FINE MODERN VIOLIN. PLAY MUSIC AT SIGHT

The Simplicity of the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight Playing.

Not only is the EHREMAIER System simple to follow, but the principles upon which it is based are also so simple that it is surprising that the old methods of learning to play at sight should have held the field so long.

The Booklet fully explaining these principles will be sent to any interested musician or student; and the success of the System can be judged by the following letter, one of a large number received:—

"I am delighted with the progress I have made. The improvement in my reading is simply marvellous. My fingers seem to fall automatically on the right notes. I think your system is wonderful and so thorough; it seems to solve every difficulty, and in so pleasant and interesting a manner.

C. C. B. LANCASTER."

The Booklet will interest you, even if you have no present intention of taking the Course. It is sent free.

The Worthiness OF THE SMALLER RUSHWORTH LIVERPOOL-BUILT CHURCH ORGANS

THE GLAMOUR of Size, Complexity, and Costliness counts for little with the true Musician. He recognises that the One- or Two-Manual Organ of the small Church or Chapel in country or town is devoted to the same high purpose as the most majestic Cathedral Organ.—That the true standards of Worthiness must therefore be the same in both cases.

Upon this basis every RUSHWORTH
Organ—irrespective of size or cost—is planned and built. AND it is a source of the greatest pride to Rushworth and Dreaper that eminent Religious and Music authorities have so frequently cited small RUSHWORTH Organs as models of skilful planning, sincere craftsmanship, and ideal beauty and balance of Tone.

CHAMBER ORGANS. Particulars of fine
RUSHWORTH Chamber Organs recently erected in Liverpool and vicinity furnished upon request.

A new book of critical and authoritative Opinions upon the distinctive characteristics of varying types of RUSHWORTH Organs will be sent free to those concerned with Building, or Re-Building, an Organ—at home or abroad.

"Dear Mr. Chester,

"I should like to express, as far as I can, my appreciation of the benefit I have for many years derived from your wonderful knowledge of musical literature, and your splendid stock of English and foreign publications. When I have wanted a piece, however out of the way, old or of the newest, you can always tell me its publisher; and you have a copy in stock practically always. Such a library as yours is of the highest advantage to a teacher, and also to a student. What I have learnt concerning musical literature is founded entirely on the contents of your musical library.

"A more perfect instrument, a greater wonder of the Piano-making Art, has not come under my fingers during my 30 years' experience."—
Emil Sauer, 1911.

THE IMPERIAL BÖSENDORFER

THE Bösendorfer Grand is an exclusive Piano. It dominates in Vienna and the whole of Austria, the most musical city and country in the world. It is used exclusively at the Austrian Imperial Academy and at the Imperial Court; at the Leschetitzky School, &c., &c. It was praised and appreciated by Liszt more than any other piano. Nearly every artist of repute who visits Vienna, plays on it. It is a piano for artists and connoisseurs.

Handwork predominates in its construction. Every piano is carefully criticised before it is passed into the sale room by Mr. Bösendorfer.

Wagner, Liszt, Bülow, Leschetitzky, Rosenthal, Emil Sauer, Paderewski, Godowsky, Grunfeld, Max Pauer, Backhaus, Sofie Menter, and many other artists enthusiastically praise it. There is no piano in the world with a more beautiful tone.

CHARLES SANFORD TERRY.

A full inquiry into the influence on musical progress exerted by cathedral choirs in this country would reveal many illuminating facts. Even the one branch of such an inquiry with which we are for the moment concerned would show that ex-cathedral choristers—who rarely continue to be connected with the establishments in which they spend their youth—frequently become important centres of musical activity, whether as amateur or professional musicians. A typical case of the desire to spread the knowledge and love of the art derived in early life by a chorister is that of the subject of this notice, Charles Sanford Terry was a St. Paul's Cathedral boy. He did not adopt music as a profession, but he became a remarkable driving force as an amateur in the district of Scotland in which his lot has been cast. His numerous friends, amongst whom are some of the best-known British musicians, have been recently deeply concerned to hear that the condition of his health enforces his complete retirement from the arduous musical propaganda he has so ably carried on during recent years in Aberdeen and the surrounding district. The sympathetic hope of all his friends is that due rest, and freedom from heavy responsibility, will soon completely restore him to full activity, and if it is too much to expect that he can again devote himself as before to musical work, that at least he may be able to continue those historical researches and publications that have earned him so much deserved distinction in Scotland and elsewhere.

Charles Sanford Terry was born at Newport Pagnell, Bucks, in 1864. He is the eldest son of Dr. Charles Terry of that town. Both of his parents were musical amateurs. His father had a limited technique on the pianoforte, and took a delight in posing Charles with impossible discords which, for an appropriate reward, the lad had to endeavour to resolve with a searching finger on the keyboard. The father's lack of pianoforte technique was shared by the son, who did not devote much time to its cultivation. Terry père also had a passion for the cornet which the son failed to inherit. Mrs. Terry sang, and composed songs, and a brother of Charles, who died in the South African War, was a prodigious performer on the cornet, and he also excelled as an executant on a particularly shrill penny-whistle, which by dint of daily immersion in a bath was reputed to acquire a 'mellow timbre.' A sister is a member of the Bach Choir.

In 1874, out of 120 candidates Charles was one of six boys who gained admission to St. Paul's Cathedral Choir School, which had recently been reorganized and converted into a residential school of the now familiar type. John Stainer was at that time the Cathedral organist, he having entered upon this responsible duty in 1872. As all the world knows, he soon afterwards accomplished those deeply thought-out reforms in the preparation and presentation of the Service music that placed St. Paul's in the pre-eminent position for its music that the existing authorities have maintained. It was a great thing for young Terry to come under the benign influence of this remarkable and deeply-regarded personality.

The Choir School in 1874 was carried on at No. 1, Amen Court, where (says Professor Terry) he believes Barham, the author of the 'Ingoldsby Legends,' formerly lived. A few of the new boys had to 'sleep out' at the Chapter House, and Terry, who was one of the number, well remembers the window-rattling that followed on the famous Regent's Park explosion which shook all London. Among his contemporaries were Charles Macpherson,—the present sub-organist of the Cathedral, with whom he often exchanges pleasant reminiscences,—H. W. Hollis, and Ellis Roberts, both now members of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Musical education at the Choir School in those days was different from that which obtains to-day. There was no music-practising room or musical instrument, and no systematic theory was taught, as later on became the rule. Professor Terry says:

Dear old Fred Walker was our choirmaster in those days, and the most vivid recollection of his tuition is of thirty boys standing round the small practice room in the north belfry tower of the Cathedral, singing as a constant exercise Handel's 'Rejoice, rejoice,' with astonishing brilliancy. I heard the boys at exercise the other day under Charles Macpherson—and they wop that record hollow.

Sir George Martin (then Mr. Martin), who came a year or so later than I did, soon made us all love him. He was always perfectly angelic to me. He gave me my first fiddle, and if he did not teach me the double-bass, I learned it at his expense, for he frequently had the privilege of playing the overture to 'The Caliph of Bagdad' on the pianoforte in fear of his life with my vigorous contrabass obligato thundering at his back. That was the time when he was writing his first anthem, 'Whoso dwelleth,' whose reduction to intelligible score my exercises frequently interrupted. Sir George used to carry me on his shoulders in those days. I should like to see him try it now!

It was the hope of joining the school orchestra that stimulated Terry's energetic exercises. Stainer, who played the viola, took part in the orchestral practices, which were devoted to the works of Haydn and Mozart, and there were occasional public appearances at Zion College. Professor Terry says:

Stainer was then in the zenith of his powers as an organist. It was only rarely that he took the boys at practices. If we had sung badly he would dock our play-time and dragoon us through scale-exercises, but his accompaniments were so exhilarating that we thoroughly enjoyed his punishments, and such was his nature that he found it impossible to be severe with us for long. Stainer suggests 'Barrett,' who was then one of the alto vicars-choral. Also I think of 'Mr. Wynne,' as we called him reverently. Did anyone ever sing 'O God, have mercy' as he did? He used to conduct those wonderful Charity Children's Festivals, long since abandoned. Two Barnbys also occur to me—one a deputy for a vicar-choral, the other Sidney Barnby, then employed at Novello & Co.'s branch shop in Queen Street,

City. His name suggests a story. Those were days when octavo vocal scores of church music were only beginning to be published by Novello & Co., and it may interest that august firm to know that most of our 6d.-a-week pocket-money was spent in purchasing for ourselves those early examples of their enterprise, though our choice was necessarily restricted to the cheaper anthems. But the choir as a whole used the old folio single-voice part copies, of which there was but one for each of the adult male parts on each side of the choir. For reasons we could never discover, Dean Church and Canon Liddon insisted upon being always supplied with copies of the anthems. We had every reason to believe that their voices had long since broken! It was obvious that treble copies of the music would be of merely ornamental use to them! On the other hand, to provide them with copies of the other parts meant putting two-thirds of the actual choir completely out of action. Hence we 'book-turners'—so the boy librarians were called—occasionally shirked our duty to the Dean and Canon. On one such occasion we were severely reprimanded, and took a subtle revenge. Bach's 'Come, Jesu, come,' was to be sung on the following Friday. We betook ourselves—R. K. Pooley (the composer of more unfinished Te Deums, probably, than any boy or man before or since!) and I—to Novello's Queen Street shop, and asked, 'What editions of Bach's "Come, Jesu" have you got?' We were told that one shilling would buy it in octavo score. "Anything more expensive?" we asked. "Folio score a guinea net," was the answer. 'Thank you,' we replied, 'we'll take two copies, and put it down to the Dean and Chapter!'

On Friday afternoon we gloated over the Dean and Canon turning the pages of an édition de luxe which we hoped was heathen Dutch to both of them!

He goes on to say:

I attained to the dignity of a 'solo boy,' but as I remember the whole school rising en masse in petition to Sir George Martin to prevent me from singing a solo indulgently allotted to me, I draw my own conclusions! The last solo I sang was Bach's 'Have mercy,' in the 'Matthæus Passion.' My voice cracked to a promising bass a few days earlier, returned to allow me to sing my swan song, and a day or two after disgustedly left me for ever!

Take it all over, I cannot be too thankful to have had the privilege of being brought up in such a school and amid such traditions and under such paragons—Sir John and Sir George. It may be that I left school with a rooted conviction that in summa arbore meant (as I frequently asserted, even under correction!) 'in the summer arbour,' but on the musical side I had laid-in a store of experience and literature and a standard of appreciation which has been of untold happiness and profit to me since. A man who has not got a hobby to jostle with his profession is a man to be pitied, and I take off my hat to St. Paul's for the many years of happiness in a pursuit of which my school-days there laid the foundation.

In 1879 Terry went to King's College School in the Strand, where, he says, he cannot recall any music except the hymns sung in a very cold chapel. Thence he went to Lancing, where there were school concerts, and a penurious steward who, at one of the annual feasts, was declared to have been overheard giving directions to his henchman as follows: 'Water for the boys, beer for the masters, sherry for the guests—and a bottle of port for the provost: not to be opened on any account!'

An enthusiastic music-master, Herr Fugger, is one of Terry's outstanding memories at Lancing in the 'eighties. He was sorely tried by his pupils, but the orchestra of masters and boys was enthusiastic.

After Lancing, Terry went to Cambridge University, and matriculated at Clare College in 1883. Stanford was then in residence, and Terry says that his activity leavened the whole University, to which he introduced great music.

Terry was a 'Fury' in the 1885 Greek play, 'Eumenides,' to which Stanford wrote fine music which later was performed in London under Richter, the undergraduates taking part. Rubinstein was in the audience. A London newspaper wrote patronizingly of the Cambridge dudes as 'twenty-five young gentlemen more or less immaculately dressed.' Sir Charles Stanford was greatly pleased with the singing, and Terry says he can still hear him exclaiming 'Bravo, children, ye ought to have gone up yourselves [to bow on the platform], ye sang like angels,' and he thinks that Sir Charles may possibly remember the Furies on the prompt side who energetically conjugated τύπτω when their recollection of the Greek text failed them. Robert Browning was brought to the dressing-room at Cambridge, and with him his Gladstone bag relatively much larger than its owner and with its owner's name in full upon it in white letters relatively larger still! Terry recalls the Sunday evenings spent at Gerbert Cobb's rooms, where there was much Schubert and Cobb's own songs to be heard, and here he would meet Sedley Taylor, still to-day as keen and fresh as ever. In 1883 Terry graduated in the History Tripos in the same list as Mr. Austen Chamberlain and Mr. Leo Maxse. The late Prince Albert Victor was also at this time studying in the History school, and he and half-a-dozen others, including Terry, used to sit weekly round the great Seeley's table and dodge his searching questions. Later on Terry succeeded (after an interval) the present Dean of Worcester Cathedral as lecturer in history at the Durham College of Science (now the Armstrong College) at Newcastle-on-Tyne. There he founded the College Choral Society, which did some excellent work and continues to flourish under Mr. W. G. Whittaker, whom Terry influenced to join the musical profession. Terry also undertook as a voluntary task the choral training of the students attending the Day Training College for school teachers, attached to the University. This work brought him into pleasant touch again with Sir John Stainer, and for the first time—Terry is good enough to say—with one who has been as close a friend, the Editor of this journal, these gentlemen being the Examining Inspectors for the Education Department. In 1898 he was appointed to the newly-established Lectureship in History in the University of Aberdeen, and he was elected to the Burnett-Fletcher Chair of History and Archæology upon its foundation in that University in 1903.

In 1898 he took up the conductorship of the University Choral and Orchestral Society, whose concerts have come to be one of the chief musical agencies in the city. It consists of a choir of about 150 members, and an orchestra of about seventy players.

In 1909 he established the first Music Competition Festival in Scotland—a movement which has spread to Glasgow, Perthshire, Fifeshire, Ayrshire, Banffshire, Lothian, Buchan, and elsewhere.

This inaugural Festival took place at Aberdeen on June 4, 5 and 6, and was a gratifying success. With it was associated a festival performance of 'Elijah,' under Dr. Coward, but perhaps the most noteworthy achievement of the event was the collaboration of about thirty of the church choirs of the city in the music of a special service which was held on the Sunday afternoon, and supported by the presence of the civic dignitaries and ministers of religion. The nexus that bound all these diverse resources in a common object was Professor Terry, who conducted. Similar doings took place in the two following years, and in 1912 the competitive section of the Festival was devoted entirely to industrial choirs, that is, choirs organized by various houses of business. Among these was one from the Aberdeen P.O., and another was constituted of railway employees. This experience confirmed the belief that the ordinary folk of the city had ample musical capacity that only needed adequate encouragement to accomplish great things. Inasmuch as for more than a generation the school children had been taught to sing, this result was not unexpected. At the church choir service on this occasion over thirty choirs took part. Stainer's fine anthem 'I saw the Lord' was one of the chief musical items, and at Terry's request Parry had specially orchestrated his early Te Deum in D. This year's Festival (which will be duly reported in our July issue) is a culmination of the labours of the previous years. The competitors again are mainly from industrial choirs, and the scheme includes two concerts on a large scale. At the first concert the programme is mainly orchestral, to be conducted partly by Mr. Hamilton Harty, and at the second Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion is to be performed with a choir and orchestra of 330 performers. Mr. Warren T. Clemens, a young conductor whose marked ability was revealed in the competitions, is to conduct. Probably this performance of 'St. Matthew' on a festival scale by the choral and orchestral resources of a provincial town is a unique achievement.

In 1906 Sir Edward Elgar attended the quarter-centenary Festival of the University of Aberdeen, and received the honorary degree of LL.D. For this occasion Professor Terry wrote a special anthem. A close friendship with Sir Edward Elgar was one of the happiest results of this meeting.

In October, 1909, a banquet was given to Professor Terry in recognition of his unique services to music in Aberdeen and the district. Lord Aberdeen (Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland) presided, and amongst those who journeyed to be present were Sir Edward and Lady Elgar, and Dr. McNaught.

Professor Terry has for many years been a regular attendant at the Leeds, Birmingham, and Three Choirs Festivals, and no one has entered more cordially into the social life that constitutes one of the chief attractions of these occasions. He collaborated with his friend Mr. Ivor Atkins in the revision of the text of the new Elgar-Atkins edition of the 'St. Matthew' Passion. He is gifted with a sense of humour, and although he is a Scottish professor—or a professor in Scotland, which perhaps is a different thing—he can bend to perpetrate a joke.

Of his thirteen published historical books, 'The Scottish Parliament' and 'The Life of Graham of Claverhouse' are standard works. He has every hope that some day his friend Granville Bantock will set the three volumes of his 'Short History of Europe' with accompaniments for bagpipes! Has not this distinguished composer set Fitzgerald's translation of Omar Khayyám? Professor Terry has exceptional abilities as a conductor, and he has lately published a set of songs that bear witness to his taste and musicianship. He has also written an operetta. Among his most prized possessions is the final proof copy of the full score of Elgar's Violin concerto, with copious corrigenda and addenda. Many letters from the composer are bound up with the volume.

It may be hoped that the seed sown in N.E. Scotland by Professor Terry during the last few years will continue to yield fruit. Surely there must be enough public spirit in the granite city to attend to this!

THE PROBLEM OF PROGRAMME-MUSIC.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

As soon as he faces the problem of programme-music the student can but feel curiously perplexed. Programme-music, as it has obtained since the middle of the 19th century, is in itself, on account of its endless range and diversity in form, texture, and ambitions, not easily dealt with; but programme-music as seen through the prism of scholastic investigation, truly becomes a thing to marvel at and to eye askance. The music-lover of yesterday was told, again and again, that programme-music at its best was little better than a freak, a weed in the garden of musical art. But for the obstinacy of composers, who, despite the verdict passed by over-ruling art-judges, persisted in writing tone-poems and other varieties of instrumental music proceeding from dramatic, symbolic, or picturesque starting points, no doubt the question would never have been carried before the music-lover of to-day.

On the other hand, after the detractors have come the abettors: and between the two the matter has more than once become distressingly involved. Indeed, some of the arguments adduced in favour of programme-music will be found to cut both ways, and to prepare an easy ground for confutation. Thus we are told that the hearer's interest in programme-music is increased by the knowledge of what the programme is—a knowledge by virtue of which he becomes richer by one or several emotions. This, though true in many cases, should be considered as very dangerous ground. When a composer calls luminous effects to the rescue, or contemplates adding a perfume-projector to the instruments of his 'orchestra,' it is also with a view of making his audience richer by new emotions or impressions. Likewise is the man richer to whom a commonplace waltz recalls some delightful association.

These, no doubt, are reductiones ad absurdum rather than arguments. What the student must remember is merely that the answer to the prejudicial question: 'Is music and a programme better or worse than music and no programme?' remains—except if one deduces it, after the fashion of Hanslick, and of Dr. Hugo Riemann, from some more or less arbitrary definition of music or æsthetic principle—wholly optional.

But even if the arguments offered pro and contra were less bewildering, the subject would remain intricate enough to call for close investigation.

The first difficulty, which is formidable, consists in establishing a clear and accurate definition of the term 'programme-music,'* which in its current acceptation stands for things as different as, for instance, Dr. Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra,' Liszt's 'Faust-Symphonie,' Balakirev's 'Tamara,' M. Debussy's 'Prélude à l'après-midi d'un Faune,' and M. Ravel's 'Jeux d'eau'—between any two of which no amount of paradox will help to discover any workable common measure.

There is, verily, no scarcity of definitions, from Kuhnau's (1700) or J. J. Engel's (1780) to the three dozen or so that one may nowadays cull from treatises of æsthetics. Volumes have recently been devoted to programme-music, in Germany by Herr W. Klatte and by Dr. Klauwell, in Great Britain by Dr. Frederick Niecks. An extensive and capital essay on the subject is contained in Mr. Ernest Newman's 'Musical Studies.' The student, therefore, will have little trouble in adopting, or in selecting as a starting-point to his investigations, one among the many submitted.

Dr. Niecks's point of view is very striking, and helps to solve the problem by practically abrogating it: 'As a rule,' he says, 'the definitions are too narrow. . . . They should embrace all possible kinds, degrees, and characters. Indeed, my opinion is that whenever the composer ceases to write purely formal music, he passes from the domain of absolute music into that of programme-music.' Similarly, Mr. Ernest Newman notes that 'there is no absolute line of demarcation between absolute music and poetic music; the two are always crossing and recrossing into each other's territory.'

However, it is necessary for the purpose of study to take into account dissimilarities rather than similarities, so as not to lessen nor to mask the problem. Therefore the student must begin by assuming the line of demarcation to exist—be it with the hope of ultimately abolishing it.

Mr. Newman gives a most adequate definition of what programme-music really is: 'In it,' he says, 'we have a definite literary or pictorial scheme controlling (a) the shape and colour of the phrases,

(b) the order in which they appear, (c) the way in which they are played off against each other, (d) their relative positions at the end.'

The student will notice that the first point is true of all categories now lumped together as 'programme-music'; the other three bear upon form only, so that there is room for certain further distinctions. Reverting to the five works mentioned above, it will be found that the first three have elaborate programmes, which may have, and have, in fact, affected the musical scheme (these programmes, however, differ in several respects: that of Liszt's Symphony consists of broad emotional or dramatic data; that of 'Zarathustra' of precise but abstract notions; that of 'Tamara' is concrete, descriptive, and narrative). M. Debussy's 'Prélude à l'après-midi d'un Faune' is but an evocation of moods suggested by Mallarmé's poem, without the music affording any clue as to the existence of a positive programme. M. Ravel's 'Jeux d'eau' are a tone-picture inspired from the fall and play of ornamental water-spouts. In the last two cases, the poetic subject controls the shape and colour of the phrases, but prescribes no particular scheme or form. To make the point clearer, let us compare with M. Ravel's 'Jeux d'eau,' Liszt's 'Jeux d'eau à la Villa d'Este': the starting point is the same, but we will forthwith perceive a difference. In Liszt's work, after descriptive phrases (to which M. Ravel's motives bear a striking likeness) appears a new motive of lofty, religious character, whose purport is emphasised by the epigraph, from St. John's Gospel: 'Sed aqua, quam dabo ei, fiet in eo fons aquae salientis in vitam aeternam.' An imaginative purpose is thus shown to exist beside a descriptive purpose; the subject consists not only of the play of waters, but of an allusion to a high symbol, of a meditative mood. It wants at least two distinct elements to control 'the order in which the phrases appear, and the way in which they are played off against each other'; and here we have the simplest possible type of an actual programme, in which the co-operation and contrast of two elements suggest the general scheme and the method of working out.

It becomes, therefore, necessary to distinguish the heterogeneous matters to which the designations 'programme-music' or 'poetic music,' and so forth, are applied: music proceeding from a mere theme on which the composer's imagination embroiders freely, no particular form being prescribed, and possibly none precluded; music whose scheme and substance are entirely governed by an elaborate narrative or dramatic plot; music that may be 'predominantly descriptive (materially descriptive), predominantly emotional, or predominantly symbolical . . . body-painting or soul-painting, imitation of tones and noises, or interpretation of moods and emotions,'* not forgetting music to which a merely symbolic meaning is attached, a 'third term,' after Kuhnau's words, intervening.

* Clearly to define any topic in criticism is most strenuous. Allusion has been made in a former article (Musical Times, May, 1911, 'Can Musical Criticism be Taught?') to the deplorable vagueness of critical terminology, and to a possible remedy.

* Niecks: 'Programme-music' (Novello), pp. 4 and 10.

If any attempt at method is to be made, one must begin by separating at least the more distinct categories. What one calls them matters little, provided one distinguishes them. Arbitrary though they may be, the designations offered hereafter may serve—at least temporarily—to that end.

As we have succeeded in establishing one preliminary distinction, let us reserve the name 'programme-music' for music that not only is dependent upon some external suggestion, but illustrates a definite programme, and is affected by it to the extent of intrinsically differing in form, as well as in quality, from what is acknowledged as 'pure,' abstract music.

Programmes, i.e., subjects consisting of several elements arranged in a given order, differ as to their constituent parts, which may belong to any of the categories enumerated above. Now, ever since the question of poetic or programme-music has been broached, theorists have been trying to decide what 'can' and what 'may' be depicted, suggested, or expressed, by music. The student is told, for instance, that materially descriptive music is music of the lowest kind. So that if he bears any respect at all for arrogant imperatives, he will feel heartily ashamed for being capable of deriving keen enjoyment from, say, M. Debussy's 'Reflets dans l'eau'; and before daring to credit the assertion that Balakirev's 'Tamara' is a masterpiece, he will be at great pains to find out how much of that work is materially descriptive, and how much may be considered as proper soul-painting.

We have assumed, however, that from the outset he has decided to take nothing for granted, and to leave no point unexamined. He will therefore put aside, as belonging to the threadbare dogmatic aesthetics that have ever impeded artistic culture and progress, the question of what is 'legitimate' in music, and what is not; and admit that what music can do, it may do. The question of what it can do with relation to a programme is not unsolvable.

Roughly speaking, the composer, when dealing with an external suggestion, may without overstepping the boundaries of music pure and simple put in action the properties of sound or of rhythm per se, or have recourse to expression. If he has recourse to conventional symbolism, the boundaries, theoretically, are overstepped.

But if it is true that absolute music and poetic music are always crossing into each other's territory, it is truer still that the distinctions which I shall now suggest are in theory very minute, and in practice often dubious or purely virtual. Taking instances of obviously 'material' description, like M. Ravel's 'Jeux d'eau,' or the opening phrases of Liszt's 'Jeux d'eau à la villa d'Este,' who could decide in which proportion the reproduction of actual sounds, the imitation in musical rhythms of the water's rhythmical play, or merely the impression conveyed, have been the composer's actual starting-point—to say nothing, for reasons that will appear later, of the effect on hearers?

Even cases in which the symbolic intention is obvious are seldom unequivocal. The final chords in 'Zarathustra' may be adduced as a typical instance of conventional symbolism; but it is not difficult to aver that they are expressive, and satisfactory from the plain musical point of view. Indeed, any disquisition of that kind is almost sure to end in one of these judgments 'of opinion,' whose limited bearing and possible fallacy I have formerly attempted to show.* But to pass an opinion after having duly studied the several aspects of a question is of course perfectly natural; and all that the student, like the critic, need do is to make sure that his opinion is his own, to test it as carefully as possible, and to remember that it is only an opinion after all.

Under the foregoing reservations it will be found useful, in order to appreciate the degree of difference between programme-music and pure music, with a view to an ulterior conclusion as to the possible merits or demerits of the former, to realise that programmes offer but a limited number of elements of suggestion, viz. :

(a) Sounds, with the corresponding rhythms.

(b) Suggestions of other than audible rhythms—for instance, those of movements or of forms—which are transposed into musical rhythms. All pantomimic music may be considered as falling under this heading. A typical example of another kind is afforded by the long holding note of the violins in Borodin's 'Steppes of Central Asia,' as monotonous as the endless sand-desert.

(c) Emotional suggestions of all kinds.

(d) Suggestions that even if considered as coming under none of the foregoing headings, afford a pretext to musical interpretation founded on an abstract analogy of some sort—from the crude type in Kuhnau mentioned in the foregoing article upwards.

The music derived from each may be called: (a) imitative; (b) descriptive; (c) emotionally associated; (d) associated by convention, without the terms implying, for the present, any æsthetic judgment. The problem we are dealing with can be solved only by considering each category apart, so as to leave no ground for ambiguity. As soon as a solution is reached, the student will do well to forget those somewhat irksome distinctions. But possibly he will not regret the time they have cost: and henceforth he will find it possible rapidly to proceed to practical conclusions, some of which will be suggested in the next article.

In our February issue we mentioned that some activity was taking place in Wagnerian circles in Barcelona. The plans for celebrating the centenary have now been settled. There are five festivals, and among the works to be given is 'Parsifal' in a concert version, an enterprise which is costing about £3,200. The orchestra will be under the conductorship of Franz Beidler, and every care has been taken to make the performances worthy of the occasion.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC, LONDON.

Among the musical institutions that deserve well of this country, Trinity College of Music takes an honourable rank as a stimulating and formative educational force. Its long and steady pursuance of high ideals in its great network of examinations spread over the British Empire, its management by men of irreproachable integrity and first-rate professional ability, and its liberal apportionment of surplus funds to the furtherance of the cause of the Art, and the assistance of students, have all contributed to inspire the respect and confidence not only of musicians but of many men of light and leading outside the profession. Whether the extraordinary desire on the part of mankind, and especially of womankind, to be examined is on the whole in the best interests of the Art may be a moot point for discussion, but that this apparently irresistible stream of tendency should be directed into proper channels is beyond doubt, and here Trinity College has found its mission.

The College grew out of the 'Church Choral Society of London and College of Church Music,' which was formed in 1872 by the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt (Mus. Bac. Oxford, 1876, and Mus. Doc. Dublin, 1887), then honorary choir-master of the Parish Church of South Hackney (London, N.E.), with the co-operation of the late Dr. Gordon Saunders and other neighbouring church organists and choirmasters. The object of the Society was to improve service music, and especially to aid the training of choirmasters. The support of the late Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley was secured, and he became the first president of the Society. The first meetings were held in the schoolroom of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, and afterwards at the Russell Institution.

A service given in Westminster Abbey was the last public appearance of the Choral branch of the Society. In 1873 a scheme of testing choirmasters in the theory and history of music, sight-singing and choir management was adopted, and the first examination was held in 1874.

In 1876 a plan of local examinations in theory was devised, and an appeal was made to middle-class schools. In thus expanding the scope of its work the College claims to have preceded the developments on these lines that later took place under the auspices of the older musical institutions. But it must be recorded that prior to 1876 the Society of Arts had carried on musical theory examinations at many local centres in the country, and the Tonic Sol-fa College had appointed numerous local examiners. In 1877 the first local examinations under Trinity College were held, and were attended by over 1,000 candidates.

In 1879, local practical examinations in instrumental and vocal music were added, with every prospect of success; and these were undoubtedly the first of their kind to be held in this country. In 1882 Higher Examinations were instituted and teaching diplomas were granted to successful candidates. Between 600 and 700 young teachers enter annually for these examinations.

From this time forward the work of the College developed rapidly. In 1887 a new and pregnant departure was made in the extension of the operations of the College to Canada. Up to 1891 no fewer than 16,000 candidates had presented themselves for local examination at nearly 250 centres in the Empire. The colonial examinations were at first only in theory, but in 1895 practical examinations were held in the Dominion, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, and in 1898 in India. This scheme involved the appointment of examiners willing to travel over the world, and the College was fortunate in being able to command the services of professors who were not only highly competent musicians but who made the art of examination a special study.

Who can measure the amount of cruel disappointment and legitimate complaint that has arisen owing to exasperating inequalities in the standards of examination from which teachers as well as pupils sometimes suffer? The fact that ability to examine is a special faculty not possessed by otherwise excellent musicians is not sufficiently recognised. Then again the creation of definite standards can only be accomplished by constant conference and comparison. A good teacher ought to be able to know beforehand almost for certain whether or not the pupils he submits will pass a given standard examination honestly and carefully conducted. Such an examination is not like a competition the results of which must necessarily vary according to the ability of the best performers who enter. Experience of some examiners suggests the advisability of their qualifications as examiners being tested by well-known experts in the art of examining, before they are allowed to operate on an important scale.

These reflections suggest others that have to do with the relation of the number of passes to the number of candidates. Does a high percentage of passes imply that an examination is lax? This is a question that could only be answered after investigation of particular cases. There are queer stories told of 'passes' being practically guaranteed in the examinations of some of the shady proprietary concerns that unfortunately are allowed to prey upon the public. But so far as reputable institutions are concerned we should say that a high percentage of passes means simply that skilful teachers know what is expected at a standard examination scientifically conducted, and that they refrain from sending in hopeless candidates.

The need for the greatest care in the mode of assessing candidates is obvious in an institution which now deals yearly with about 28,000 students. Since the College was instituted it has examined over 500,000 candidates. Upwards of 500 public and school local centres are established in the United Kingdom and Greater Britain. The gross annual income of the College amounts to about £30,000. About £1,200 is disbursed annually in connection with scholarships. To mark the coronation year of King Edward VII., and to commemorate the thirtieth anniversary of its own foundation, the College in 1902 presented the sum of £5,000 to the University of London for the purpose of establishing a University Chair of Music.

The gift was accepted by the University, and His Majesty was graciously pleased to permit the use of the title 'The King Edward Professor of Music.' The University selected as its first professor Sir Frederick Bridge, C.V.O., M.A., Mus. D., who is now chairman of the Board of the College. Although examining is the chief occupation of the College, it has a complete and highly efficient teaching establishment at its headquarters in Mandeville Place, London, W. Here there are numerous commodious rooms, and an organ with four complete manuals CC to C, 61 notes, and Pedal organ CCC to G, 32 notes, with tubular-pneumatic action throughout. A second organ for practice, with three complete manuals, has just been added. About 400 students are now receiving their training at the College, many of whom are destined for the profession. A special feature of the teaching branch is the College orchestra, which is directed by Mr. Wilhelm Sachse. It meets twice a week, and with the various orchestral professors numbers ninety performers. Concerts are given at Queen's Hall. The establishment of a pension scheme for the teaching and administrative members of the staff is one of the thoughtful and considerate acts of the College Board. To this pension fund the College contributes very liberally, and will continue to do so, if circumstances permit, until the scheme in course of time has become self-supporting. Students are prepared for University examinations as well as those conducted by the College. The President of the College is the Right Hon. The Viscount Ridley, and there are amongst the thirty-two Vice-Presidents the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Alverstone (Lord Chief Justice), Earl Curzon, Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Frederic Cowen, and other eminent personages. Three of the chief workers of the multifarious business concerns of the College are Mr. G. E. Bambridge, F.R.A.M., &c., Dr. C. W. Pearce, and Mr. Shelley Fisher.

Mr. Bambridge is the Director of Studies. He was a student at the Royal Academy of Music, 1860-66, and for forty-eight years he held the organistship of St. Luke's, Westbourne Park. At the Academy he studied under Walter Macfarren (pianoforte), George Macfarren, Charles Lucas (harmony and composition), and Dr. Steggall (organ). In 1881 he joined the Board of Trinity College, and in 1905 he undertook the responsible office he now holds.

Dr. C. W. Pearce is the Director of Examinations. His degrees he holds from Cambridge. He was Dean of the Faculty of Music at London University 1908-12, and he has examined for degrees at the Universities of Cambridge, London, Durham, and Victoria (Manchester). He holds numerous Academic distinctions. He is a prolific composer of church music, is one of the editors of The Organist and Choirmaster, and the author of many books.

Mr. Shelley Fisher, the Secretary of the College, came first in 1880 as superintendent of classes and lectures, and was elected to his present office in 1881.

Probably one of the best known and most highly regarded of the travelling examiners of the College is Mr. Myles B. Foster, who, on behalf of the institution, has visited many climes and encountered many adventures.

All who know the work for musical education that has been accomplished by Trinity College of Music, London (to give it the title it took in 1904), and the spirit in which it is administered, will wish it continued prosperity in its career of usefulness.

Occasional Notes.

In our issue for November, 1910, we announced a scheme, in which Dr. H. P. Allen was one of the prime movers, for providing Oxford with an adequate music library. We are glad to hear that the work is now completed. The following announcement has been issued over the names of C. B. Heberden (Vice-Chancellor of the University), T. B. Strong (Dean of Christ Church), Walter Parratt (Professor of Music), H. P. Allen (Choragus), and H. T. Gerrans (Treasurer):—

The Music Students' Library, on behalf of which an appeal was made in November, 1910, is now placed in a room forming one of the bays of the gallery in the Radcliffe Camera. The Bodleian Curators have accepted the library on deposit, and have most kindly granted the use of this room for the definite purposes of musical study. They have provided the necessary conveniences for reading, and the librarian has made very generous arrangements for the comfort of the readers. A comprehensive selection of music and of works on music from the Music School collection has also been placed by him in the room to supplement those deposited by the committee. The Library, which is now in daily use, contains standard editions of the complete works of Palestrina, Orlando di Lasso, Schütz, D. Scarlatti, Bach, Handel, Purcell, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Wagner, Chopin, Liszt, Berlioz, Brahms, the complete German and Austrian Denkmäler (43 and 16 volumes), and twenty-eight volumes of the Musik-Forschung publications. In addition to these complete editions, the library contains full scores of the chief choral and orchestral works of modern composers, such as Richard Strauss, Bruckner, Dvořák, Tchaikovsky, Franck, Verdi, Debussy, Reger, Glazounov, Stravinsky, Scriabine, &c. There are more than 1,300 volumes of scores, and several thousand separate compositions. The aim has been to provide full scores, wherever possible, but where the price of such scores was prohibitive (e.g., the Operas of Strauss), the pianoforte editions have been obtained. Under the Copyright Act the Bodleian Library receives all music published in this country. A selection of these works, together with about 400 volumes on the literature of music, is included in the Music Students' Room. The works of Parry, Stanford, Elgar, Mackenzie, Bantock, Walford Davies, Holbrooke, &c., &c., are thus rendered more accessible. The thanks of the committee are offered to the large number of donors and subscribers who have helped music in Oxford by their generosity. It will be specially interesting and gratifying to them, as it is to the committee, that His Majesty The King has graciously presented a complete set of the works of Bach (Bach Society edition). There are, of course, still many gaps in the library which, it is hoped, may soon be filled. The committee feel emboldened by the success of their first appeal to suggest to all who are interested in Oxford and its music, that they may see their way to supply these deficiencies by the gift of one or more of the desired works. A list of desiderata (with the cost) would gladly be supplied by the Choragus. The arrangements which the librarian has kindly made provide that the library is open to music students daily from 10 to 1 and from 5 to 7, and that the books and music are available to the general reader, under the usual conditions, at other times. The library, which has now made such an encouraging start, will undoubtedly prove attractive not only to lovers of music generally, but to all music students as a place for serious study and research.

High prices were paid for some musical manuscripts and autographs that were sold at a recent auction held by Herr Leo Liepmannsohn in Berlin. The pièce de résistance of the collection was Bach's original manuscript of the first part of the 'Wohltemperirte Clavier,' which was sold for £1,000. His cantata 'Christ unser Herr zum Jordan kam' reached £125. A Beethoven manuscript from the year 1820, with sketches of a Symphony, went for £32 10s.; a sketch of a pianoforte piece, £9 10s.; a letter to his nephew, Karl von Beethoven, £10; and the manuscript of a Canon, £35. Some letters from Brahms changed hands for £41. A humorous letter from Chopin to Jules Fontana (in Polish) brought £11 5s. A Gluck manuscript, a fragment of the French 'Orpheus' score, sold at £125. Tiridate's air from the opera 'Radamisto,' by Handel, in a hitherto unpublished version, was sold at £475. Other manuscripts disposed of included Franz Liszt's sketches to the 'Wartburglieder,' £16 10s.; a Scherzo by Mendelssohn, £29 15s.; the Finale of a String-quartet by Mozart, £48; Cimarosa's Canon, 'Missale notatum,' £125; Robert Schumann's Ballade 'Der Königsohn,' £58 10s.; his autograph libretto of 'Genoveva,' £23; and a short unpublished treatise on counterpoint, £27. The Wagner manuscripts included a fragment of the unfinished opera 'Die Hochzeit,' £600; a pianoforte sketch of a Symphony, in E flat, £125; his orchestral arrangement of Rossini's duet, 'The sailors,' £250; the Albumblatt, dedicated to Madame Betty Schott, £97 10s.; a study of the 'Flying Dutchman,' £46 10s. Manuscripts by modern composers included Reger's 'Concert,' Op. 17, sold for £7 15s.; an Albumblatt, by Richard Strauss, and a fragment of Saint-Saëns's opera, 'Proserpine.' Letters by Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Wagner were also sold.

All who are engaged in the practical side of music must at some time have been harassed by the pitch problem. There are various pitches in vogue in this country, from that of military bands downwards, the vibrations for middle C varying from 542 down to 512. In association with the Music Trades of Great Britain and Ireland a preliminary committee has been brought together with the object of introducing uniformity of pitch and of obtaining its universal acceptance. The standard adopted is the 'French Diapason Normal,' viz.: A 435.45 and C 517.84 at 59° Fahrenheit, which obtains in all other important countries of Europe and in the United States. To forward this movement it is desired to form a large representative committee, and all who are interested in the matter are invited to lend the support of their names, in order that an appeal to the Government should be strengthened by the authority of the whole of musical England. The preliminary committee consists of Dr. Charles Vincent (chairman), Mr. Arthur Dale, Mr. Henry Billinghamurst, Sir Frederick Dyson, and Mr. Henry Willis, junr., secretary, Rotunda Organ Works, High Street, Homerton.

Thanks to Sir Edward Elgar, one hears more and more frequently of the performance of British works on the Continent. Apparently Elgar is held in high esteem among modern composers by the promoters of the Siliti Concerts at St. Petersburg. A pamphlet summarising the programmes of these concerts for the last ten seasons informs us that the following instrumental works have been given to St. Petersburg audiences: The 'Cockaigne' Overture, the Variations, the Introduction and Allegro for strings, the Overture 'In the South,' and the first Symphony. Only Debussy, Roger-Ducasse, and Strauss among living foreign composers have been honoured to an equal extent.

We have received a pamphlet which gives (in English) an interesting description of a new choral work, 'Quo Vadis,' by Felix Nowowiejski. It is prefaced by the following translations of Press criticisms:

Vaterland, Vienna: 'Blooming melodic, astounding artistical polyphony, and the rich brilliancy and saturated colouring of the instrumentation are compelling the unprejudiced critic to unlimited appreciation.'

Das Prager Tageblatt: 'The first scene already is showing the real artist, his treatment of the chorus. His cleverness in finding new orchestral effects is certainly exorbitant, the first male chorus is already of incomparable euphony. The "March of the Pretorians" will carry the concert halls.'

Die Post, Vienna: 'The musical drama "Quo Vadis" can rank with the best modern works, and as regards the dramatic effect it is excelling a great many of the latest chorus works of similar character. Above all, the final chorus is rising to such a level with its full orchestra, organ, and harp, that it is actually a masterwork of counterpoint.'

It is fair to the composer to add that in quoting these amusing translations as specimens of German-English, we are not expressing any opinion as to the merits of the music.

The analytical programme of 'Quo Vadis' (by John Bernhoff, who fortunately is able to write intelligent English) affords a good example of the futility of quoting themes which are supposed to associate particular significance, but which, away from their context, are simply ludicrous. For example, we read:

No help! No way out! We must perish! Even the Capitol affords us no shelter. Despair and death is the key-note to the following motive:

Six days have seen no blush . . . of morn!

We believe we could have written this tune ourselves.

An unknown 'Feuille d'Album,' by Chopin, written in Countess Scheremetjew's album in 1873, has been given by the present Count to the committee appointed to supervise the erection of the Chopin monument. The composition is to be published by a Moscow firm for the benefit of the monument fund.

The Quinlan Opera Company, to the number of 173, left Liverpool on May 19 on board the 'Nestor,' the new Blue Funnel liner which sailed for Cape Town and the Colonies on her maiden voyage. The Company are announced to give 607 performances of thirty-two operas, including the 'Ring.' They took with them 437 tons of luggage and scenery, and will travel 37,000 miles, visiting the five Continents.

BACH'S FANTASIA IN A MINOR:

AN ANALYSIS.*

BY BROOK SAMPSON.

This Fantasia is one of the two great compositions called by this title composed by J. S. Bach for the pianoforte, the other one in D minor being commonly known as the 'Fantasia Cromatica.'

The Fantasia opens with a theme mostly in five-part harmony, which may be divided into two sections—the first, bars 1-4, and the second, bars 5-12:

This principal theme is repeated twice during the movement, once complete and once in part, and finally in a complete form as the concluding portion of the movement. The composition can therefore be divided into sections, as follows:

PRINCIPAL THEME.

|---|---------------|
| Bars 1-12 in A minor | I. Bars 13-30 |
| " 31-42 repetition, in E minor | II. " 43-73 |
| " 73-80 second section, in D minor | III. " 80-99 |
| " 100-111 repetition, complete, in A minor, concluding with Tierce de Picardie. | |

THE EPISODES.

In Episode I., bars 13-30, a figure is introduced in the Tenor part which is imitated at the 5th below in the Bass part, and repeated in the Tenor, a modulation being effected to C major:

The same figure is now used in canonical imitation between Alto and Treble, which is continued in an ascending sequence for several bars. Below this a new figure appears in the Tenor part, which joins in the sequence :

* This analysis is made from a copy of the Fantasia con Fuga No. 19 in the 'Musical Pantheon.' There is an arrangement for the organ by W. T. Best.

It will be noticed that a figure (bar 5) in the principal theme is constantly in use up to the repetition of the principal theme in E minor. The Episode modulates from A minor to C major and then to E minor.

Episode II., bars 43-73. This Episode opens with figures previously used but slightly altered so as to introduce a regular quaver motion, which is not broken until bar 67. Following the full cadence in E minor, bars 41-42, the Episode immediately changes to A minor and to C major, when the canonical imitation passage used in the previous Episode is partly repeated—Alto and Treble—bars 47-52. The quaver figures are continued and modulation effected through E minor, D minor, to F major, when the canonical passage is again introduced (bars 66-69) and the Episode progresses so that the second half of the principal theme is introduced without any formality in D minor.

Episode III., bars 80-99. The last figure in the Treble, bars 79-81, is imitated by the tenor at a 5th below, then by the Treble, and the quaver motion is resumed in bar 83. A sequential passage is started, bar 90, the repetitions being by step of a 2nd ascending :

A few bars more and a half-cadence in the tonic key ends this Episode, when the principal theme is repeated exactly as at first except the last bar, which is a more decided ending, forming the cadence called Tierce de Picardie.

THE FUGUE.

This fugue has two themes, which are enunciated separately and then combined. The first (principal)

Subject (Theme I) enters in the Treble part, and it may here be pointed out that the last entry in the fugue is also in that voice:

The exposition is in regular descending order (Treble, Alto, Tenor, Bass), ending at bar 18 when, after an Episode, there are three extra entries, viz., Real Answer in Bass, Subject in Alto, and Subject in Treble.

SECOND THEME (BARS 36-60).

The entries of the second theme are in a series of Stretti in each of which the second voice enters at a different point—in the first Stretto at the third crotchet, in the second at fifth, and in the third at seventh crotchet :

The two themes combined :

The first half of this theme then appears in a series of entries—Bass, Tenor, Treble, Alto, not in Stretto.

The two themes are then combined :

First Theme.Second Theme.

- | | | |
|-------------|-------------|-------------------------------|
| Bass 61-64. | (1) Bass. | (2) Treble, A minor. |
| „ 64-67. | — | (2) Tenor. |
| | | (2) Bass. |
| | | A minor to D minor. |
| „ 68-71. | (1) Tenor. | (2) Bass, D minor. |
| „ 74-78. | (1) Treble. | (2) Alto, D minor to A minor. |

The fugue can therefore be clearly taken to be in three portions, which are shown in the following outline analysis :

Codetta I., bar 4. A few notes to fill up the bar and lead to the entry of the Answer.

Codetta II., bars 8-10, has the same figure used in Codetta I. to begin with, then a phrase from the counterpoint above the Answer (bar 6) is used in the Treble with suitable figures in the Alto.

Codetta III., bar 14. A figure resembling that of Codetta I., with two parts above.

Episode I., bars 18-22. A figure in the Bass is repeated in sequence, then the Treble has a figure which is repeated in sequence and again over the entry of the theme, bars 22-23 :

Episode II., bars 29-33. A bar in three parts with a distinctive figure in each—that in the Treble being from the Theme—is repeated in sequence a 4th higher, then the phrase of two bars thus formed is repeated a 2nd lower :

Codetta IV., bars 46-47. A figure from the second Theme—the last figure in the Tenor, bar 45—is responded to in the Treble, repeated in sequence twice, and then imitated in the Alto part.

Episode III., bars 50-53. A bar in three parts with figures different from those in Episode II. is repeated a 2nd higher. Keys, D minor, E minor :

Episode IV., bars 71-74. The figures used in this Episode freely copy those in Episode II. The modulation is from D minor to A minor, as if preparing for the last entry of the principal Theme, but a transient modulation is made to D minor.

Coda, bars 78-80.

JOHN BULL.

BY H. ORSMOND ANDERTON.

One of the most interesting figures among the group of musicians who lived and worked in the palmy days of the Shakespearean era is that of John Bull, whose striking and individual genius places him somewhat apart from the other members of 'the nest of singing birds.' These were mainly choral writers. Tallis, Tye, Byrd, Gibbons, Wilbye—all of them, though they did a certain amount of instrumental work (and Gibbons's Fantasias are notable) thought, nevertheless, in terms of the choir and the human voice. Bull, on the other hand, as well as Farnaby and Dowland both of them men of lesser calibre, though of charming and distinct genius—was almost wholly an instrumental writer. He did some choral work, it is true; but his extant works in this kind are only nine in number. Of these, we may specially mention the anthem 'Almighty God,' or as Boyce prints it in his collection, 'O Lord my God'—in many ways a fine piece of work, and one which shows the same forward-gazing outlook as we shall find to be characteristic of Bull's instrumental work.

On the whole, however, he thought in terms of the harpsichord, was an untiring innovator, and the chief virtuoso of his time—in fact, a sort of Elizabethan Liszt. He has been singularly neglected. His work is not really difficult of access, since there are forty-four of his pieces preserved in the FitzWilliam Virginal Book, seven in 'Parthenia,' and thirty in Benjamin Cosyn's Virginal Book—some of these, however, being duplicates. Reprints have been made of the first two; but they are expensive; and the third is still in manuscript; and all—even the reprints—are puzzling to modern eyes, the result being that Bull is practically unknown to the general public at the present day. It is therefore with much pleasure that we welcome an album containing ten of his best pieces, in modern notation,* edited by Prof. Bantock.

Additional interest attaches to the book in that it contains an excellent reproduction of the very striking portrait preserved in the Music School Collection at Oxford. It shows a dark, rather swarthy, man of a somewhat Italian type, with black hair, beard and eyes, which last are fine and arresting. The beard and moustache are slight; the ruff is in the embroidered Elizabethan style; and there is at one side an hour-glass surmounted by a skull having a bone across the mouth. Round the frame of the original runs the verse, indicative of the esteem in which he was held:

'The bull by force
In field doth reign:
But Bull by skill
Good will doth gayne.'

He came of a Somersetshire family, and was born in 1562: was educated in Queen Elizabeth's Chapel, under William Blitheman, and in 1582 was appointed organist of Hereford Cathedral. In 1585 he was admitted a member of the Chapel Royal; and in 1591, on Blitheman's death, succeeded him as organist. This was not at that time a separate office, but it was the custom for Bull to act in this capacity. Meanwhile, in 1586, he had been admitted Mus. Bac. at Oxford—'having practised in that faculty 14 years'—and in 1592 he proceeded Mus. Doc., having also, at some previous time, taken a similar degree at Cambridge. In 1596 he was appointed, on Queen Elizabeth's nomination, first Gresham Professor of Music, a special dispensation being made to allow him to give his lectures in English, since he was not a Latin scholar. In 1601 he went abroad, leaving Thomas Byrd (son of the great Byrd) as his locum tenens. In 1607 he married, and took service as chief musician with Prince Henry—that elder brother of Charles I., whose fine nature and great powers endeared him to all he met, notably Sir Walter Raleigh during his captivity in the Tower, and whose early death inflicted a real loss upon the nation.

Some little mystery clings about Bull's later life. His passions would seem to have been strong, and to have led him into some irregularities—a hypothesis to which his portrait certainly lends colour, being evidently that of a man of strong emotional temperament. In any case he left the country secretly, under a cloud; was stripped, in consequence, of all his appointments; and went to Brussels, where he found a position as organist. Later (1617), he succeeded Waelrent as organist at Antwerp Cathedral; and he died and was buried in that city in 1628.

Bull was acknowledged as facile princeps among players on the organ and harpsichord, in his own day; and, as a composer, if he does not occupy a similar position, he at any rate stands among the first three or four. He is an untiring experimenter, and seems on the whole to be more interested in the intellectual problems he set himself than in the actual sound effects that resulted. Mr. Barclay Squire characterises his work as 'more ingenious than beautiful'—a verdict in which Dr. Naylor concurs. Prof. Bantock, however, with his kindred pioneer nature, takes a more favourable view. His sympathies go out to this born inquirer; and he is inclined to rank him next to Byrd—perhaps a somewhat over-friendly verdict. His work is unequal; and some is undoubtedly very dull, as anyone will agree who goes through all his pieces in the FitzWilliam Virginal Book. As an instance, one may mention 'Salvator Mundi.' At his best, however, his work is very fine, individual, and of remarkable intellectual quality.

The pieces in the present album are as good a selection as could have been made. The notation is modernised, and occasionally a slight alteration for modern ears is suggested by being enclosed in square brackets. A brief biography and a slight discussion of each of the pieces are given in a preface, the work as a whole giving an excellent idea of the man and of the musician.

No. I. is a Prelude in C, one of the six in the FitzWilliam Virginal Book, and perhaps the best. Although slight in thematic interest, as such things usually are, it has a distinct character of its own. No. II., 'Dr. Bull's Juell,' is found both in the FitzWilliam, and in Benjamin Cosyn's, Virginal Book. In the first two bars it is distinctly in C, but then modal characteristics appear. It is an 8-bar tune, followed by six analogous strains, partly in the nature of variations, partly fresh matter on similar lines. It is a pleasant and fresh little piece.

The most remarkable piece follows, taken from the FitzWilliam Virginal Book. It is called 'Hexachord,' and consists of the six notes from G to E ascending and descending, with three accompanying parts. The canto fermo then starts on A, and so on, rising a tone each time. This leads, at the fourth presentation, to a difficulty: Bull has to start on C♯, and the phrase C♯, D♯, E♯, &c., would be a serious matter, and would land him in even more awkward complications, later. Bull wrestles with himself, and takes the bull by the horns, writing C♯, E♯, F, &c. Now it was not known that keyed instruments were so tuned at this period, as to allow of the use of enharmonics; and it has always been supposed that the adoption of such a tuning was largely due to Bach, and emphasised by the

'Wohltemperirte Clavier'; yet here is Bull doing the same thing one hundred years earlier. In the ninth presentation occurs a curious anticipation of Walther's 'Trial Song'; and at the fourteenth and fifteenth, fresh points of interest occur. The time changes to $\frac{3}{4}$, and then to $\frac{2}{4}$, though this last is only nominal, for there are three distinct rhythms combined in a complicated passage by no means easy to play. After this, the tangles are smoothed out, and the piece ends quietly. Bull was fond of setting himself such puzzles. His virtuoso and pioneer natures seem both to come out strongly in this piece, in which his gaze is clearly towards the future. There is another, but less interesting, specimen in the FitzWilliam Virginal Book.

No. IV. is a 'Galliard' from 'Parthenia.' Sir John Davies speaks of a galliard as

With lofty turns and caprios in the ayre,' and it was very common at Elizabeth's court, and in the society of the time. The present is a very attractive specimen of such tunes; and is distinctly in D, major and minor. This is followed by a setting of 'The Spanish Pavan,' and that again by 'The Duke of Brunswick's Alman,' and 'Piper's Galliard.' In the note on this last, Prof. Bantock has some interesting remarks on a question raised by Dr. Naylor, who objects to Bull's using a subject of Dowland's. All these last three are interesting pieces; the 'Alman' with its repeated notes, and the 'Galliard' with its rapid passages, giving indications of Bull's virtuoso instincts. 'The Duchesse of Brunswicke's Toye' is a graceful little piece in $\frac{3}{4}$ time. Farnaby uses the same subject for his 'A Toye' (Farnaby Album, No. 8), but in duple time. Prof. Bantock and Dr. Naylor differ as to their comparative value; but it seems unnecessary to assign a preference; each is charming in its own way. 'Dr. Bull's Myself'—the Gigge which follows—seems oddly at variance with the portrait: the reserve and dignity of the latter appear incapable of relaxing into the gaiety of this merry piece. It is an interesting case of self-portraiture. The last, No. X. is 'The King's Hunt,' a setting of a favourite tune of the period. Farnaby has done one also, but we agree with Prof. Bantock in preferring the present one. It is a piece of 'programme-music'—another case of Bull's reaching forward into the future, though in this matter he was not alone in doing so. The same editor has made an effective arrangement of it (in the 'Old English Suite') for small orchestra.

Altogether the Album is a very interesting one, and an important addition to our available stores of Old English Music, of which the public are at last beginning to learn the value.

THE OPERATIC PROBLEM.

By D. C. PARKER.

Much has been written as to the ultimate destiny of the Hammerstein Opera House, and a consideration of the question of opera in this country makes clear the innumerable problems which surround it. There is the size of the ideal opera-house. It is manifest that a theatre too large is as great a mistake as a theatre too small. And those who have visited some of the newest German theatres, fitted with the latest equipments, feel, doubtless, that something like them should be built in this country. Ever since Semper and Wagner set to work over the Bayreuth Festspielhaus, the German architects and stage-managers have been busily experimenting with new things. First, there was the idea of the sunken orchestra and the problem of acoustics generally. Then there were changes in the auditorium and the disposition of seats in it. More recently came the various methods of lighting and heating, and a multitude of ingenious inventions in stagecraft. From this it will be seen that the practical utility of an opera house and the physical comfort of its habitues have been subjects of much thought. This country is, therefore, placed at a serious disadvantage in comparison with others. In the provinces there is no theatre in which opera can be given under anything like ideal conditions.

Apart from this aspect of the matter, there are other problems to be solved. It would be a very desirable thing to have opera in London, in the same way as it is dispensed in the big Continental centres; that is, during the whole of the winter season. But, leaving out of account the fact that it would have to be a paying concern, there is the question of public taste. This is one of the most difficult matters to deal with, and one which has not received the attention it deserves. Musicians know very well that what is very popular in one place is not so in another. Take, for example, the difference between France and Italy. In France, the public look for a beautiful and artistic use of their own language. In Italy, grave faults and mannerisms are ignored if the singer have a good voice. In Germany, we see here and there an almost slavish adherence to tradition, arising, in all probability, from an over-zealous earnestness to preserve what is valuable. These differences are not confined to the general attitude towards dramatic music. They are shown in the repertory. Massenet, for instance, is highly popular in France in a way that Bruneau is not, but the latter has a following in some of the French provincial towns, and he has attracted attention to himself in German circles in a way that the composer of 'Thais' never did. A return of the operas which comprise the current repertory in Italy, would show that some works have a vogue there which they do not enjoy elsewhere. To give another proof of this, Gounod's 'Faust' is played most frequently in France and in Russia.

As regards London, one is more in the dark. Compared with that of most other important centres the operatic history of London has been fitful and singular. But the question resolves itself into this: Do the public understand opera sufficiently to justify the belief that an opera-house would be reasonably full? Wagner, truly, is very popular, and his works should be a great 'draw' at any time. But when one thinks that an opera like Leroux's 'Cheminéau' passed practically unnoticed, the condition of things does not seem very bright. To get the full value out of a continuous series of performances, one must learn to go to the theatre for education, to regard it as a temple of art. It is because this view is tenaciously held, and is based on practical experience, that foreign governments and municipalities pay such large sums for opera. It is constantly said in this country that the jaded man or woman wants to go to the theatre for relaxation after the troubles of the day. But I should be sorry to have to admit that the mental powers of the British business man are more swiftly exhausted than those of his equivalent on the Continent. In one of his prefaces Strindberg mentioned that people complained of his sad tragedies, as though, he adds, tragedies could be merry! For those interested in every phase of human life, the tragedy must be as much a subject of study as the comedy. So long as the public regard the theatre as a place to spend a leisure hour, the idea of a permanent opera house in London is ridiculous.

The chief value, perhaps, of a fixed home for opera is that it means, sooner or later, an extension of the repertory. The habit of going and listening having been acquired, the management can step more freely into less familiar realms. To be able to hear, as one can in every town of any pretensions in Germany, operas by Gluck, Mozart, Weber, Marschner, Verdi, Wagner, Goldmark, Strauss, Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari, and a host of others, means a tremendous gain to our knowledge of music. Appreciation of composers depends very largely upon appreciation of their predecessors and successors. How much greater our interest in Wagner would be if we knew Gluck, Meyerbeer, and Weber thoroughly! Without this systematic activity, we lose much. When, one may ask, was 'The Magic Flute' last given in London? Truly it is a regrettable thing that we have to confine ourselves to the music which the dictates of fashion make possible.

THE IMPERIAL CHOIR. GHENT (MAY 30—JUNE 2).

A large company attended the reception given by the Imperial Choir at the Albert Hall on April 28, to meet M. Maurice de Smet de Naeyer (Director-General of the Ghent Exhibition), M. Henri Boddaert (Honorary Secretary-General), and M. Dorsan van Reyschoot (Director of the Palais des Fêtes). The occasion constituted the formal inauguration of the plan, conceived by the vast but practical ambition of Dr. Charles Harriss, which was to take 2,000 voices of the Imperial Choir on a visit to the Ghent Exhibition, with the giving of concerts of English choral music, and the strengthening of international amity, as the immediate and ultimate objects. Lord Strathcona, President of the Imperial Choir, occupied the chair.

In his Presidential address Lord Strathcona said that his association with the movement dated back to its inception in 1903, when he became Official President of the Canadian Festival. But his relationship with the founder of the Imperial Choir actually began about twenty years previously to 1903, for Dr. Harriss then dedicated to him what he understood was the first musical work Canada had produced. The next development of the movement took place on this side of the ocean, when the Canadian-British Festival was held at the Queen's Hall in 1906, in the presence of King Edward. In 1907 a concert was given to the Overseas Premiers, when representatives of the whole British Dominions were present. In 1908 a choir visited Canada, where they were received by the then Governor-General, Earl Grey, who had lent the weight of his influence to this work for many years. On the occasion of that visit the Choir sang in the Parliament Buildings at Ottawa, during a sitting of the House. But 1909 was the year that saw the formation of the Imperial Choir in London. This was made possible by the generous action of the choral conductors of Greater London, who threw in their lot with the movement. The result was the great gathering of choristers which was seen in the Albert Hall on the present occasion. Owing to the death of King Edward in 1910, the real début did not take place until the following year. In 1911 the Choir made its first appearance with 4,500 voices at the opening ceremony of the Festival of Empire. Meanwhile the movement was busy in other parts of the Empire, for the conductor of the Imperial Choir in 1911 took 250 choristers from England to see their Empire as it really was. The cost of this six months' musical tour was almost entirely provided by the enthusiasm of the peoples of the Overseas Dominions. The last event at which the Imperial Choir took part in its full strength was the opening of the Shakespeare Festival at Earl's Court last year. But this coming visit to Ghent would be their first visit to a foreign land. It was singularly fitting that this visit of the Imperial Choir should take place on the eve of the anniversary of the signing of the Treaty of Ghent, which ended the war between England and the United States in 1814. This visit to Ghent would be one of the greatest events in the already brilliant annals of the Choir. It was the first step in the international aspect of the movement, and he extended to the distinguished representatives of the Ghent Exhibition a cordial greeting on behalf of the Imperial Choir.

The Right Hon. Sir Joseph Ward, Bart., P.C., K.C.M.G., M.P., said the occasion would remain memorable to him for two special reasons; the first was that the great gathering was presided over by one of the most distinguished men of the Empire, Lord Strathcona, who was known in all parts of it as a man with a great record, and who had served not only his own country well but the Empire as a whole, while in every walk of life that he had occupied he was known as the grand old man of the Empire; and the second reason was that the Choir was controlled by a conductor of remarkable organizing powers—Dr. Harriss—who had enthused all with whom he had come in contact. Dr. Harriss deserved well of all lovers of the Empire for the public-spirited way in which he had devoted himself to the wonderful musical organization that he had taken all round the world.

What was wanted in all parts of the Empire was to know more of each other; the different branches of the British people should have more practical acquaintance with each other. This should apply not only to our public men, our business men, our professional men, but especially to every class of our workers, and as there was the world over a very large proportion of the musical world among the workers, it must be conceded that this organization was doing, had done, and would do good from an Empire standpoint in spreading the gospel of Empire in a pleasant, interesting, and musically-educative way.

Over-Seas representative men knew how powerful Great Britain was, but wanted to see the links of the chain more generally welded, and to have the bonds that bound our race in the old country and in the scattered parts of the Dominions drawn closer and closer together, so that the ties of union and the unbreakable bonds of kinship would make our scattered Empire more impregnable than any other Empire could hope to be. Our history was a great one; its pages were full of the heroic deeds of our men on land and sea. The underlying basis upon which the British structure the world-wide over had been erected was freedom, generosity, and unselfishness, and what our forefathers as well as the men of the present generation had worthily and hardily won, and which we now held, would never willingly be relaxed. Our motto should be peace, and our efforts should be for the preservation of peace, and to enable this to be secured there must be no question about our superior strength and to our being ever prepared for a trial of strength if it should be forced upon us.

It was by methods such as those adopted by Dr. Harriss and his great Choir that a broader knowledge was disseminated. He breathed good will, and he indicated in an effective way one of the ideals of the people of a powerful Empire. He and the Imperial Choir would go for the first time to a foreign country; they would go as musical and peaceful emissaries; they would carry the banner of peace and good will, and would proclaim that we were in earnest in our desire to be at peace with the nations. He (Sir Joseph Ward) firmly believed that the Imperial Choir would assuredly do much to help, which would be endorsed in all parts of the great British Empire for their complete success. It augured well when we found a number of delegates from Ghent here joining with the people of Britain in giving a hearty welcome to Dr. Harriss and the Imperial Choir, with the assurance that their earnest aspiration was that the British singers might create in the breasts of those whose pleasure it was to hear them a feeling of friendliness and kinliness to the people of these Isles.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie said: 'My only claim to say a few words is that it was my privilege to take an active share in the initiation of a unique musical scheme which has developed far beyond expectations. When just ten years ago Dr. Harriss asked me to conduct a cycle of Festivals which was to cover the whole Dominion of Canada, I undertook to do so on one condition, and that was that all the music to be performed should be by British composers. This plan was at once adopted, and carried out with an amount of success which I look back upon with the greatest of pleasure. Some ten or twelve new choirs were established for the purpose, and concerts were given in many places for the very first time. Surely the man who can make blades of grass grow where none ever grew before deserves our admiration. And now he has found this magnificent and huge Choir of 4,500 singers, which he has conducted with such exceptional skill and with such splendid effect. The only difficulty is that the Choir suffers from its own greatness, inasmuch as that so few buildings exist on this earth in which it can be heard in its entirety, and to be heard to full advantage is a grand thing. Real enthusiasm is a rare quality, and ought to be hailed with a fittingly enthusiastic response and encouragement. And we are here to offer all that. Now it is proposed to visit a country which has the honour of giving birth to the great Orlando di Lasso, and some of the first geniuses in musical history, whose collective names constitute that famous Flemish School of composition which in its day practically taught the world. I have no doubt that our English singing will be welcomed, and meet with fullest sympathy in that country. And I believe that every individual member of this vast Choir feels keenly the responsibility he undertakes in representing a department of music in which we have considerable reasons to imagine that we excel. Our pleasant duty is to give them the heartiest "God speed," and wish every success to their unique artistic and patriotic enterprise.

Sir Vezey Strong said: 'In joining in welcoming the representatives of Ghent to this mass meeting of the Imperial Choir, I feel I may rightly do so on behalf of the City of London. No one can appreciate more completely than I do the scope and strength of the Imperial spirit, for it was focussed in the City of London in all its fulness in the great and moving events which grouped themselves round the Coronation of their Beloved Majesties King George V. and Queen Mary, when as Lord Mayor it was my high privilege to receive the representative personages and communications from all parts of the Empire. I have the greater pleasure in being present to-day, as by happy coincidence this day is the second anniversary of the historic gathering at the Guildhall from whence issued the declaration in favour of the principle of Anglo-American Arbitration—that great message of international friendship, conciliation, and peaceful progress which echoed, and still echoes, throughout the British Empire and the civilised nations of the world. Our chairman to-night, Lord Strathcona, took an honoured part in that meeting, and he has since so appropriately become the President of the Imperial Choir. We may regard the Choir as "the singing missionaries of the Empire." Dr. Harriss, the leader and inspirer of this unique Choir, is a musician; but he is more, he is a man of vision. In an age when to be enthusiastic is not considered "the mode" he dares to be an enthusiast. In an age when the fashion is to imitate others, he dares to be himself. When earnestness is too often not so much appreciated as it should be he dares to believe and confess that music is the great gift of God. He breathes the spirit of the American poet, who said:

"God sent His singers on earth
With songs of sadness and of mirth;
That they might touch the hearts of men,
And bring them back to heaven again."

To the man who dares to see the vision, God gives the larger vision, and so the mission of the Imperial Choir, Britain's Imperial Mission, is to be the peacemaker of the world:

"God, who made thee mighty,
Make thee mightier yet."

It was the German Emperor who said to the German Choral Societies: "Do not attempt the great works. Sing the folk-songs of our country." So the Imperial Choir might well sing in Germany the simple folk-songs of the Anglo-Saxon race, and so weld by the magic and power of music the discord between nations into glorious and abiding international harmony, for "The song that nerves a nation's heart is in itself a deed."

Other speakers were Dr. Harriss, who summarised the development of Empire music since 1901, and the movement that had led to the formation of the Imperial Choir, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., and M. de Smet de Naeyer, who gave thanks on behalf of the directors of the Ghent Exhibition.

The musical programme—contributed by the Imperial Choir under the direction of Dr. Harriss—included performances of Sullivan's 'O Gladsome Light,' Elgar's 'Land of hope and glory,' and 'Forward, brothers,' from Parry's 'War and peace.'

Church and Organ Music.

FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

The 259th Festival of this Corporation was held in St. Paul's Cathedral last month, and like everything for which the Cathedral authorities are responsible, was marked by the greatest reverence and care, to the minutest detail, both of the actual ceremonial and the music. The Cathedral choir was largely augmented by members of the choirs of the Chapel Royal, St. James's, the Temple Church, &c., the instrumental part being sustained by a full orchestra and the organ.

As has long been customary at these festivals, the service opened with the 'In Memoriam' Overture by Sir A. Sullivan, the performance on this occasion being particularly fine. The Canticles were sung to the setting by Henry Smart in B flat, the orchestral accompaniment being a special and impressive feature.

But the outstanding event, musically, was the anthem which had been specially written by Sir Hubert Parry, the subject chosen (Psalm 46: 'God is our Hope and Strength') being evidently congenial to the composer. The work abounds in impressive moments, of which may be mentioned the introduction, and the first entry of the voices p, followed by a fine crescendo; also the harmonic change at 'into the midst of the sea.' The pp entry of the voices, the chord growing downwards at each successive entry on the words 'but God hath showed His voice,' makes a profound appeal by its unexpectedness, and is nothing short of an inspiration. 'Be still, then,' is another notable section, betraying the unerring instinct and fertile resource of the composer. Mention must here be made, too, of the bass solo, so finely sung by Mr. Greeves Johnson, of the Cathedral choir, who showed a thorough knowledge of his subject, and very considerable dramatic power. The service concluded with Beethoven's 'Alleluia,' from the 'Mount of Olives.' We wish to make special acknowledgment of the labour so earnestly bestowed upon this and so many similar occasions by Sir George Martin. Few know anything of the endless round of detail involved in the preparation of such a service. There are the preliminary correspondence, which is necessarily very heavy, the sectional rehearsals, the choir and band seating, the provision of copies, &c. It remains to be said that with the exception of the anthem, which was conducted by the composer, the service was directed by Sir George Martin, and that the organ was finely played by Mr. Charles Macpherson. The occasion will be memorable to all who had the good fortune to be present.

THE ORGAN AT THE ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

On April 13, 1912, Mr. Hilton Carter, manager and secretary, kindly permitted me to photograph the case and keyboards of the well-known organ in the Royal Albert Hall. I photographed each of the stop jams separately, and the resulting prints are so clear that the name of every stop can be read with certainty. Prompted by curiosity, I compared the names of the stops with the printed specification in Hopkins & Rimbault, and at once perceived several important discrepancies. Going further, I searched other books and periodicals, only to find that they all agreed with the H. & R. version, which was copied from the description circulated by the late Henry Willis at the time the organ was in course of construction. But before the completion of the instrument the builder made several alterations in his original scheme, adding two stops to the Solo organ and three to the Pedal organ. Thus the number of speaking stops is 116 and not 111 as invariably stated. All this was done on his own initiative and at his own expense, with the object of adding brilliance to the Solo and more foundation tone to the Pedal.

If the nine spare knobs represent preparation for speaking-stops, it will be seen that the total number of such was intended by Mr. Willis to have been 125—only one less than at Sydney Town Hall as originally built.

Messrs. Willis inform me that the instrument has had nothing done to it since its erection, with the exception of refitting and releathering the heavy pressure and vacuum main bellows in the blowing chamber, and the usual attendance for tuning, &c. I think I can say, with a degree of assurance which amounts almost to certainty, that a complete list of the stops has never yet appeared in print. It is therefore with some amount of pleasure that I append such a list, for the accuracy of which I can vouch.

The fourteen stops which are not to be found in other accounts of this organ—i.e., those which were added to the organ during the course of construction, and the spare knobs—are printed in italics.

It will be noticed that the knobs of two of the Pedal stops have been placed above the couplers and that three others are below the Choir stops, thus showing that they were added at the last possible moment when the organ was practically completed.

Below I give a summary of the stops of this enormous instrument:

Total 138 stop knobs. Not 124.

In these days of large organs it is worth remembering that at the time this organ was opened (1871) it was the largest in the world. Since that date it has had to yield its pride of place in favour of the following:

			Speaking stops.
Riga ... Dom	1883	124
Libau ... Church of the Trinity	1885	131
Sydney ... Town Hall	1886	126
St. Louis Exposition	1904	140	(now 128)
(Now in Wanamaker's Store, Philadelphia)
Kevelaer... Wallfahrtskirche	1908	122
Hamburg St. Michael's...	1912	163
Liverpool Cathedral (under construction)	1917

It will be seen that if the number of speaking stops is to be the sole test of size, the Sydney organ was never 'the largest organ in the world.' This is, however, a matter of opinion, and even of controversy, at the present time (witness the discussion in these columns recently over the rival merits of the Liverpool and Hamburg instruments). I have adopted that method of comparison here as being the readiest for the purpose.

SIDNEY W. HARVEY.

FREE CHURCH MUSICIANS' UNION.

While the above Society as yet only represents a very small fraction of the amateur and professional musicians it ought to include, during the five years of its existence it has done a great deal to bring together workers of many denominations, and to afford a basis for united action in the future. The annual meeting of the Union was held at Newcastle-on-Tyne on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 13 and 14. The Centre in existence in this city has the distinction of being the largest in the provinces, and of providing the Union with its President for the current year. Mr. George Dodds, one of the most popular of local organists, is associated with the Wesleyan Church in Elswick Road, and besides his activities in other directions, provides a musical service of exceptional merit. The choir is large, about eighty strong, and gives performances of such works as Elgar's 'The Kingdom,' and Brahms's 'Requiem.' On the Tuesday evening, the delegates and members were invited to a reception in the Laing Art Gallery by the Lord Mayor. The following day was wholly given up to meetings and social functions. During the morning, several places of interest were inspected by the visitors under the guidance of local members. In the afternoon, the council meeting and annual meeting of members were held. London was selected as the venue of the next annual meeting, and Dr. J. D. McClure, of Mill Hill, was elected President for the coming year. In the evening a well-attended public meeting, the largest gathering yet held under the auspices of the Society, took place in the Town Hall, the President occupying the chair. He chose as his address the subject of 'The attitude of the earnest choirmaster to church music,' and skilfully pointed out to the audience, what the usual occupant of the pew seldom learns, that the former is only doing his duty if he sets up and maintains a high standard in his choice of music.

He discussed, not without the saving grace of humour, and yet making an earnest appeal to his audience, the question of the popularity of weak hymn tunes, the relation of the congregation to the choir and its particular portions of the service, and drove home many useful lessons. The Nonconformist Choral Union, whose conductor is Mr. G. Dodds, but which, on this occasion, was conducted by the local secretary, Mr. J. Heywood, sang familiar oratorio choruses with admirable tone and spirit, Mr. E. J. Potts contributed songs by Bach, Handel and Parry in excellent style, and Mr. Meale gave some organ solos. Speeches were made by Rev. David Fyfe, Alderman Sutton, Mr. Horace Holmes, J.P., of London, and the founder and general secretary, Mr. H. F. Nichols.

A meeting of the Hampshire Association of Organists was held at Winchester on Saturday, April 19, when a large number of members were present from Portsmouth, Bournemouth, Southampton, Winchester, Alton, Basingstoke, &c. Portsmouth was represented by the hon. secretary (Mr. Turner), Miss Suter, Miss Gibbons (Gosport), Messrs. J. H. Cowan, A. E. Saxby, C. Gibbs, W. Ridoutt, H. Sennett, and W. James, &c. The proceedings opened with an organ recital in the Cathedral, when Dr. Prendergast exhibited fully, in a choice programme, the rich and varied tone of the organ. Thereafter he presided over the business meeting, at Wolvesey Church Hall, when he congratulated the members on the great success that had attended the Association, and on its wonderful growth, the membership having now reached seventy. Valuable advice as to the future working of the Association was offered by Dr. Sweeting (of Winchester College), Mr. Russe (Bournemouth), and others. A very interesting feature of the meeting was the presence of the Rev. F. G. Wesley, a son of the famous organist of Winchester Cathedral. Mr. Wesley delighted the members with his reminiscences of old times, and spoke of the great good that such an association should be able to do. It was decided to hold the next meeting at Southampton on September 20, when it is hoped that Dr. Sweeting will be able to read a paper.

The inaugural dinner of the newly-formed Sheffield and District Organists' and Choirmasters' Association was held on May 17 at the Grand Hotel. Seventy-four musicians were received by Mr. J. W. Phillips, the President of the Association. The members decided to take a trip to Chester Cathedral for their next meeting on June 21.

The bi-centenary of the organ at the Church of St. Magnus-the-Martyr, London Bridge, on which an article appeared in our issue for May, 1912, was celebrated on May 2 with a special service, attended by the Lord Mayor of London and Alderman E. E. Cooper. The occasion was designed to benefit the fund for the restoration and reconstruction of the organ.

The new organ at Settle Parish Church, opened on April 24, by Mr. H. G. Ley, organist of Christ Church, Oxford, has two manuals (CC to C, 61 notes) with independent Pedal organ (CCC to F, 30 notes), 24 speaking stops, 8 couplers, patent interchangeable combinations, tubular-pneumatic action throughout, and a hydraulic engine. The builder is Mr. T. J. Binns, Bramley Organ Works, Leeds.

At Grace Church, Brantford, Ontario, full choral evensong was given on Ascension Day, by the combined Anglican choirs of the city, consisting of 125 voices from Grace Church, St. Jude's, St. John's, St. Paul's, St. James's, and Trinity. The canticles were sung to Garrett in F, and the anthem was 'Lift up your heads,' Hopkins. Mr. Frederick C. Thomas, the organist and choirmaster of Grace Church, presided at the organ.

The Æolian Choir, Brooklyn, New York, gave a recital of sacred a cappella music at St. Mary's Church on April 8, under the direction of Mr. N. Lindsay Norden. A programme of four- and eight-part works included Schreck's 'A Passion song,' Tchaikovsky's 'Light Celestial' and 'Lord, our God, have mercy,' and Palestrina's 'Gloria Patri' for double choir.

A highly-creditable performance of Handel's 'Samson' was given in the Parish Church of Ash-next-Sandwich on April 22, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Bailey, organist of the church. The band and choir numbered sixty performers, who played and sang in a most praiseworthy manner. The soloists were Master Percival Bayley, of the London College for Choristers, Miss Marian Pilcher, Mr. John Pearson, and Mr. Fred Noakes. Mr. A. H. B. Reeve was at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. Dixon-Smith, organist of St. George's Church, Deal, contributed excellent work at the organ.

Horatio Parker's oratorio, 'Hora Novissima,' was sung at Christ Church Cathedral, Montreal, on April 28, under the direction of Mr. W. Lynnwood Farnam.

The Ely Oratorio Services were held on May 6, when Brahms's 'Requiem' and Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' were performed. The choir, which numbered about 200 voices, was drawn from Ely, Cambridge, Newmarket, and Huntingdon. The band was led by Mr. Haydn Inwards. The soloists were Miss Moger, Madame Lambe, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. Joseph Farrington. Dr. A. W. Wilson conducted.

Brahms's 'German Requiem' and Palestrina's 'Stabat Mater' were sung at Westminster Abbey on May 7 by the Bach Choir, who are always heard at their best in such music and such surroundings. Both works were performed with reverence and full beauty under Dr. H. P. Allen's direction, and the effect of the performance was both impressive and moving. The solo parts were entrusted to Miss Gertrude Sichel and Mr. Frederick Ranaflow. Between the two choral works Dr. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Tallis for strings was played.

On Wednesday, May 7, the trustees and congregation of Mount Gold Wesleyan Church, Plymouth, made a presentation to their honorary organist and choirmaster, Mr. Nicholas H. R. Normington, who has just completed five years' service.

Reviews.

Praise the Lord. Unaccompanied motet for eight voices. By John E. West.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

In these days, when so-called sacred music is imported from the drawing-room or the stage, one welcomes a piece of church music that is serious, thoughtful, appropriate, and of high musical quality. These epithets apply fitly to Mr. West's motet 'Praise the Lord,' a setting for double choir of the first three verses of Psalm cxiii. The manner is of course contrapuntal—choir answers choir, or both intermingle—and the harmonies, although the tonality wanders far afield, are diatonic. The plunge from F into D flat on the words 'The Lord's name is praised,' and a later change from D flat to A, though not a daring harmonic experiment in the eyes of modern romanticists, are effective by contrast with the evenness of the surrounding tonality. The composer's restraint makes eloquence easy. Some pictorial suggestion, where overlapping phrases piled up from second bass to first soprano depict the 'rising up of the sun,' and a gradual descent of melody in the second choir against falling chords in the first shows the 'going down of the same,' is justified by the musical continuity of the passage, which is self-sufficient apart from the words. The music here borrows from the part-song, but discriminately. There is a fine resumption of the opening subject, with some close imitation between the choirs, and a sonorous building up of counterpoint through the keys of E flat, B flat minor, and D flat, with a sudden return to B flat major on the last bar, makes a striking Finale. Throughout one is impressed by the quality of Mr. West's choral writing and the dignity of his ideas.

Mozart's Operas: A critical study. By Edward J. Dent.

[London: Chatto & Windus.]

If memory serves, it was Herbert Spencer who insisted upon the moral value of admiration. In this volume Mr. Dent is in his element. We feel that Mozart is the musical deity and that the author is his prophet. The book may be safely recommended to all interested in the music of Mozart and his contemporaries. The compositions of the period are examined with care, and every page reveals a wide knowledge and a burning enthusiasm. English amateurs know too little of the dramatic Mozart. Until the Carl Rosa Company revived it recently, 'The magic flute' must have been little more than a name to many. Those to whom Mozart means simply the Pianoforte sonatas and the 'Jupiter' Symphony cannot have an adequate idea of what the composer stands for. The present book is calculated to stimulate interest in the operas. Mr. Dent rightly insists on the view that they are more than a string of songs, as so many seem to think. He also impresses one with a fact which cannot be too emphatically insisted upon, namely, that Mozart's powers and superiority can be realised only when the music-lover knows what his contemporaries stand for. This is a book which should be found in the library of every serious musician.

Echoes. By John Pointer. The Little Sandman. By Brahms (arranged by John E. West). Aubade. By John Ireland.

The above part-songs are for female voices, and are useful additions to this branch of musical composition. Mr. Pointer's piece is a Trio calling for experienced singers. It has a melodious swing and some effective modulations, and is supported throughout by an interesting accompaniment. 'The little sandman' is a Trio arrangement of Brahms's charmingly-accompanied folk-song melody, and will, we imagine, be welcome to ladies' choral Societies and upper schools. Mr. John Ireland has made a deservedly high reputation as composer of graceful vocal music, which he is able to adorn with a beautiful accompaniment. 'Aubade' is a good specimen of his refined and artistic style.

Mediæval Musical Relics of Denmark. By Angul Hammerich. Translated from Danish by Margaret Williams Hammerich.

[Leipsic: Breitkopf & Härtel.]

This scholarly folio by Professor Dr. Angul Hammerich, of Copenhagen University, is the embodiment of a series of lectures on 'Danish musical history of the Middle Ages,' and is admirably translated by Mrs. Hammerich. Not only are there given the facsimiles of many important musical items of pre-Reformation days, but translations, in modern musical notation, are furnished, prefaced by a perfectly lucid historical account. Dr. Hammerich has unearthed some rare treasures from the MSS. of the Cathedral of Lund and the Ringsted Convent Church—all of which amply prove a high state of musical culture among the Danes of the Middle Ages.

In regard to the 5th example, namely, the Sequence 'Letabundus,' usually called 'Prosa de nativitate Domini,' Dr. Hammerich says that 'it appears to be older than the time of St. Bernard,' but he does not seem to be aware that the music is in a Brit. Mus. MS. of the early 12th century (Add. 18362, f. 109b) and is also in an English Gradual circa 1140, as well as in a 12th century MS. in the Bibl. Nat., Paris (Lat. 1139, f. 80b). However, Dr. Hammerich tells us the interesting fact that this old melody has been wedded to an Anglo-Norman song of the 13th century in praise of beer, probably the oldest beer song in existence.

The colotype facsimiles are magnificently reproduced, being the work of F. Hendriksen, and the work itself is beautifully printed by Nielsen & Lydiche, of Copenhagen.

Now let her charge and spare not. By Frances Pilkington. Now I see thy looks were feigned. Thomas Ford. The Oriana Series of Madrigals. Edited by Lionel Benson.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

These are two more of the treasures of the past brought forward by Mr. Benson, in a form for popular use. Both madrigals or part-songs have a special utility by reason of their being in four parts. Pilkington's easy and dainty piece is mostly in solid harmony, varied by points of imitation. Ford's little piece is from 'Music of Sundrie Kindes' (London, 1607), and is again easy and flowing, and has some quaint harmonies. Both pieces are marked for expression by Mr. Benson, and as no one knows better how to deal with music of this kind, his suggestions are valuable.

Masterpieces of Music. Edited by E. Hatzfeld.

The four recent issues of this attractive and cheap series have nearly completed the announced list. In the volume on Handel, Mr. Henry Davey writes instructively, and with authority, on his life, the general features of his music, and his 'borrowings.' The music is represented by a few favourite airs, the 'Harmonious blacksmith,' Variations, and smaller pieces, among which it is curious to find a pianoforte transcription of a violin work. One of the best essays in the series is that on Liszt, by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the quality of which can be judged by the author's admirable lectures delivered recently at the Royal Institution, and reported in these columns. Sir Alexander has also written attractively on Verdi. There remains the volume on Meyerbeer, whom one is surprised to encounter in a company that excludes Berlioz. Mr. Arthur Hervey's essay is, however, good reading, and one cannot grudge this opportunity to an enthusiast. In these—as in previous issues—a full-page portrait is given in each volume, and numerous illustrations appear in the text.

THE PEDAL ORGAN.

SIR,—I would not have it thought that I wish unduly to press any analogy between the organ and the orchestra. The point of my contention is surely summed up in the final paragraph of my last letter. Dr. Froggatt does not reply to the questions contained in that paragraph. (I assume now, as ever, that the ear is the final arbiter.)

I have before me particulars of some of Mr. Robert Hope-Jones's recent achievements in organ building. As is well known, he carries the principle of 'continuation' to greater lengths than most of us yet care to copy. At the same time, in his larger specifications—he does not advocate more than thirty-one ranks of pipes for any organ—it will be seen that one or more independent ranks of big scale and on really heavy wind pressure are set apart for use only on the Pedal organ, presumably because he wishes this department to be immeasurably superior in power to orchestral basses.

I may observe that as compared with the orchestra the organ is merely a machine, it is therefore a comparatively easy matter to produce, in the bass, weight sufficient to satisfy the ear, where wind can be supplied in any quantity at considerable pressure and where there is room to plant a sufficient number of pipes. But I know of no method other than that of one or more independent ranks.

I entirely agree with the final sentence of Dr. Froggatt's letter. So unusual is the instrument that it contains all the requirements he mentions—and a few others. Most of the leading experts in this country have inspected it. Not a few recognised leading players have tried it, and are coming to try it. I hope, Sir, that I made it clear that Dr. Froggatt would be very welcome to show whether 'continued' basses can 'hold their own.' I do not, in practice, find that they can, although they are of incalculable value in directions other than that of making weight.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

'MUSIC ON THE SHAKESPEAREAN STAGE.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I have recently gone through Mr. Cowling's book on 'Music on the Shakespearean Stage,' and it appears to me that the work displays a lamentable non-acquaintance with first-hand authorities on the subject in question. Only to quote two instances, the recent works of Professor Wallace and of Mr. W. J. Lawrence are ignored. In the present work I have noticed some slips:

1. The reference to the Fortune theatre should be to the Blackfriars.

2. The date 1550 for 'Ralph Roister Doister' is inaccurate.

3. The equation of 'a sackbut of Mark Antony' as a property for a play called 'Mark Antony' is wrong; the fact is that the entry chronicles the payment of 40s. for a sackbut bought from the famous sackbut player, Mark Antony Bassano.

4. Shakespeare is accused of making 'a curious slip' in reference to 'jacks' (Sonnet 128). 'He calls the keys of a virginal "jacks," whereas the jacks were quite distinct from the keys.' Shakespeare does nothing of the kind. His simile was intended for the jacks, when a fair lady was endeavouring to tune the instrument:

'Those jacks that nimble leap
To kiss the tender inward of thy hand.'

5. The Musette is not a synonym for a hautboy or shawm; it is really the bagpipe. Shakespeare alludes to the Irish Uilleann pipes as 'woollen pipes.'

But let me add that the book is a useful one, particularly for those whose purses may not feel equal to the purchase of Feuillerat's large quarto, or Mr. W. J. Lawrence's monumental book on 'The Elizabethan Playhouse.' Professor Wallace has written two most researchful volumes on the period, admirably documented, and Dr. E. W. Naylor has recently issued 'Shakespeare Music' with contemporary musical illustrations.

SIR,—In the very interesting article on the above subject in your May issue, Mr. Andrew Freeman asks for information as to 'what became of the Green organ which was a favourite instrument of His Majesty George III.'

I am glad to be in a position to answer this query. Green's organ—the small organ at Windsor Castle—was presented by King George III. to Downpatrick Cathedral (the Cathedral of the diocese of Down), and the King also gave £1,000 towards the restoration of the venerable church. This was about the year 1795. Green's organ was enlarged by Waffington of Dublin, in 1815, and was again repaired and enlarged by Telford in 1870 and 1896. It is now (1913) being reconstructed and restored by Harrison & Harrison of Durham.—Yours faithfully,

Obituary.

MISS MARY LAURA EGERTON, of Terrington, York, who died at Scarborough on May 5. The deceased was well-known in Yorkshire society, alike for her social qualities and position as for her zeal in the cause of musical progress. She founded the Yorkshire musical competitions and did much to support the late Miss Wakefield in her missionary efforts to expand the usefulness of the movement. Miss Egerton was co-secretary of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals, and was a considerable force in the affairs of that body. She was laid to rest on May 9, in the God's Acre near the home she loved so well. A writer in the Yorkshire Post well sums up the motive that governed her life and endeared her to a large circle of friends: 'Stricken down in the midst of her strenuous labours by a mysterious illness, which laid her on her back for a whole year, she literally to the last moment worked for her fellow-creatures and her God.'

The following are some additional particulars of the career of the late Mr. BARTON MCGUCKIN, whose death on April 17 was recorded in our last issue. For close on twenty years (1880-99) he delighted audiences as an operatic tenor of the first rank. Born at Dublin on July 28, 1852, he commenced his studies under R. Turle, as chorister of Armagh Cathedral, whence, in 1871, he became first tenor of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. During 1875-76 he took lessons from Trevulsi, at Milan, and made his début in oratorio at the Crystal Palace Concerts in 1877, also singing at the Handel Festival in 1878. His first appearance in opera was with Carl Rosa at Birmingham, as Ithaddeus in the 'Bohemian Girl,' on September 10, 1880, and he created many operatic parts, e.g., in 'Esmeralda,' 'Colomba,' 'Nadeshda,' 'Promersi Spasi' and 'Manon.' In 1905 he was appointed Director of the Dublin Amateur Operatic and Choral Society, and was Musical Director of the Dublin International Exhibition in 1907. His last appearance was at the Coronation of King George V., in June, 1911. In private life he was very popular.

Less than two months after the death of his elder brother (John Thomas) comes the news of the passing away at Ottawa, Canada, of the veteran harpist, THOMAS THOMAS, better known as Aptommas. He was born at Bridgend, Glamorganshire, in 1829, and studied the harp from his early years, giving many successful concerts both at home and on the Continent between the years 1851-67. On January 18, 1872, he performed at the Gewandhaus Concerts, Leipzig, and his playing was much admired. He played on several occasions for Queen Victoria, and as leader of a band of harps at the Belfast Musical Festival of 1879. He settled in America in 1895, and gave a very fine concert at Carnegie Hall, New York, on January 16, 1905. Many of his compositions are well known, including his cantata, 'The Pilgrim's Progress,' and he also published a 'History of the Harp.'

Mrs. D'OYLY CARTE (Mrs. Stanley Boulter), on May 5, in London. She was a business woman of exceptional capacity, and was always an unseen force behind the efforts of Gilbert, Sullivan, and D'Oyly Carte. After the death of the last of the 'triumvirate,' Mrs. Carte had carried on with conspicuous success the management of the Savoy revivals and the work of the touring companies.

H. STEUDNER-WELSING, at Vienna, his native city. At one time, and for many years, Mr. Welsing was resident in Liverpool, where he was well-known as a pianoforte player of great ability and also as a teacher.

THE OPERA SEASON IN NEW YORK.

The Operatic Season which recently came to an end in New York has on the whole been successful. It has been remarkable as being the longest on record in New York, lasting twenty-three weeks uninterruptedly, from the middle of November to a month after Easter. During that period 154 performances were given, the operas staged being thirty-six, out of which nineteen were Italian, twelve German, three French, one American, and one Russian. As will be seen, the Italian works carried the day, not only in the number given, but likewise in the number of their performances, which latter amounted to eighty-six. As usual, the German operas given were almost exclusively works of Wagner, which were heard on thirty-five occasions; Humperdinck was represented by two operas and ten performances; Mozart's 'Magic Flute' was given nine times. After Wagner, the greatest number of representations was accorded to Puccini (twenty-eight), next to whom came Verdi with sixteen.

Seven performances were given of operas by Wolf-Ferrari, who may now be considered to have definitely established himself as a draw at the Metropolitan House. Of Puccini's operas, his 'Butterfly' appears to be the most successful in New York, while his 'Fanciulla del West' does not appear to have attracted, as only four performances were given. Two works that show no abatement in the affections of the New Yorkers are 'Aida' and 'Gioconda,' which are always safe cards to play. It has always been taken for granted that 'Cavalleria' and 'Pagliacci' are inseparable, but during the last season this tradition has been broken, one or other of them on more than one occasion being bracketed with 'Il Segreto de Susanna' or 'Hänsel und Gretel.' The absolute novelties included Moussorgsky's 'Boris Godounoff,' which had been promised the previous season, but on account of insufficient rehearsal had been put on one side, and 'Cyrano,' by Walter Damosch, which had its first production on any stage. The American composer's work had a friendly reception, and the critics treated it kindly, but in spite of this it seemed clear that the American operatic composer is still a hope of the future. Many old friends were forthcoming, such as 'Orfeo,' 'Gli Ugonotti,' 'Il Barbiere,' 'Don Pasquale,' and the 'Manons' by Massenet and Puccini respectively. Although, as has been said, the season was successful, yet never perhaps, or certainly for years, was there one so full of contretemps. The cold-catching propensities of the artists continually placed impresario and conductors in a quandary, operas announced having to be changed, not merely once but twice, during the day of performance. One German tenor who was appearing for the first time, when half through 'Tannhäuser' completely lost his voice, and had to continue and finish the opera in dumb show! A serious and regrettable blank was felt in the sudden death of the stage-manager, while the gentleman who assumed his post almost immediately fell ill. There is always the other side of the medal, however, and the trump card who never disappointed was Caruso, whose slightest indisposition is as anxiously inquired after by the operatic public as that of many crowned heads. The season saw the introduction of a new conductor in the person of Signor Polacco, with a first-class Italian reputation, and engaged to replace Campanini at Covent Garden during the present season. The new-comer, who proved himself in every way worthy of the post, will return to the Metropolitan next winter. Unavoidably delayed, Toscanini was unable to conduct for about a month after the opening of the season. A special event, and one that was awaited with great interest, was the announcement that he would conduct an orchestral concert. It will be seen that in spite of mishaps (and many of them) the operatic season of New York, 1912-1913, was gratifying to artists and public alike. The concert season might have ended equally happily, had the idea not occurred to form an Italian Philharmonic Society, for the purpose of performing Italian symphonic music exclusively. All seemed to promise well; the first programme was drawn up, and the date of the first concert announced. Although the scheme was entirely extraneous to the work of the Metropolitan direction, yet they showed themselves well disposed towards it, so much so that Madame Frances Aldo, wife of Signor Gathi Casazza, would have sung, and part of the orchestra from the Opera House was to help. All unfortunately ended in smoke, owing to the Italians protesting against any Germans being engaged. Strikes, anonymous letters, threats, even as to bombs at the concerts, compelled the organizers to abandon the whole enterprise.

CLAUDE TREVOR.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

THE GERMAN SEASON.

By way of celebrating the Wagner Centenary the Royal Opera Syndicate devoted the first month of its season—beginning on April 21—to German opera exclusively, and largely to Wagner opera. As a result, in addition to the 'Ring,' 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' and the 'Flying Dutchman'—with, of course, 'Tristan'—have been brought to light. The 'Ring,' after a generation of familiarity, is now made the vehicle for the 'star' conductor. In other words, when the representations were conducted by Herr Arthur Nikisch, there was much enthusiasm; when by anyone else—as happened when Herr Nikisch was called away to Berlin, and the youthful and useful, if not inspired, Herr Paul Drach took his place—there was less interest. Herr Nikisch's reading will not be loved by the patriotic Teuton; it has nothing of the storm and stress, the blaring brass and tearing string, with inaudible soloists and unintelligible action that a succession of German conductors have accustomed us to. There is a delicacy, a refinement, and a poetry that leave the voices (and their defects) in high relief, and weld the whole orchestral furnace into a liquid glowing mass, that, had it been presented earlier, would have won recognition sooner for the genius of Richard Wagner. Under Herr Nikisch's hands, the score warmed and comforted and never scorched as of old. Those of us who remember the strenuous times of thirty years ago, when the score, then largely incomprehensible, was thrown and blown at us, thank our artistic destinies for Herr Nikisch. Those who heard the work for the first time under his guidance must have wondered why their forefathers made such a bother about Wagnerian noise. Yet it is not to be supposed that the interpretation was of the milk-and-water type; far from it. There was plenty of life, but it was always in the proper place, and to the purely orchestral numbers Herr Nikisch gave a fire and animation that but accentuated the value of the remainder. The casts were in the main familiar. Madame Saltzman-Stevens, Fräulein Kappel, and Madame Kirkby-Lunn—the latter in better voice than last season—have repeated familiar efforts, and Messrs. Cornelius, Hensel, Van Rooy, and Kiess have done as they did before. The new recruits have been satisfactory; mostly so Herr Bader, who, if not equal to former Hundings, is, in spite of his name, no worse; and Miss Kathleen Howard, who has in a strong contralto voice with an even scale a medium that should carry her far.

'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin,' former favourites which have suffered banishment—chiefly to the provinces—seemed rather shy in finding themselves in London once again, and did not appear to any great advantage. In spite of some good work by Fräulein Perard-Petzl, Herr Hofbauer, Fräulein Kappel, and others, the impression left is that the palm is with the English touring opera companies, who any day can show the Royal Opera Covent Garden, how to perform 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin' without boring their audiences to death—or driving them to the refreshment room. The 'Flying Dutchman,' given towards the end, when Madame Destinn was available, was better done. There was good singing from Madame Destinn and a superb presentation of the Dutchman by Herr Hofbauer who, realising that the music flattered Italian opera very sincerely sang it accordingly and ravished his audiences. Of the new work 'Oberst Chabert,' included in this part of the season, it is not possible to speak very highly. Herr von Waltershausen is a clever composer, but his imitative faculty is too largely developed. His score excites respect because of the number of old friends one meets in it. One's hat is constantly being removed as La Tosca, Salomé, Marguerite, or Dalila pass by. But the piece was uncommonly well acted. The germ of the story is the Enoch Arden tragedy. It is chiefly a long duet that is sometimes a trio, and there is but one concerted number whose theme has done service before. Of chorus, spectacle, and movement, there is none—and the management had only to provide the scenery. Fräulein Perard-Petzl and Herr Hofbauer distinguished themselves; Herr Buysen—who had appeared before under Mr. Hammerstein's régime—did not. Then Herr Humperdinck's somewhat melancholy 'Königskinder' has been tried again, with a new and pleasing Goose Girl in Fräulein Angela Sax, and an excellent King's Son is Herr Ziegler. But the snow scene killed the work as it killed the children; and the management is left with that beautiful scenery on its hands. The two performances of 'Tristan' were unequal. In the first, Madame Saltzman-Stevens did not do herself justice, and Herr Cornelius was inclined to the stolid, but there was fine work from Herr Van Rooy as Kurwenal; yet report speaks well of the second representation. The award on the German season goes to Herr Nikisch and the 'Ring,' with the 'Flying Dutchman' as a good second. Dr. Rottenberg conducted the operas other than the 'Ring,' but scarcely realised anticipations.

ITALIAN AND FRENCH OPERA.

In the season of Italian and French opera which began on May 20, the former has predominated to date. The beginning was unmistakably Italian, since it was made with 'Pagliacci,' and with no less a person than Signor Enrico Caruso as the chief clown. Signor Caruso has not come to terms with the Syndicate for six years. In the interval he has apparently been singing his hardest to the American public—one thousand and fifty dollars sounds more than £350—and his voice shows it. The old 'pearly' quality is missing, but none of the temperament. That carried matters a long way, and the public had a full measure of the 'Caruso sob' for its two-guinea stalls. Mlle. Carmen Melis, a new-comer with more power as an actress than as a singer, assisted in the representation, and Signor Sammarco was in his old place to delight all amateurs—singers or otherwise—with his fine delivery of the Prologue. Finally Madame Melba has returned, and celebrated her twenty-fifth anniversary of opera in London by a moving performance of 'La Bohème,' with Mr. John McCormack, Signor Aquistapane (new), and M. Dinh Gilly as her associates. 'La Tosca,' with Madame Destinn, a moderated Signor Martinelli, the delightfully polished Scarpia of Signor Scotti—much missed during his three years' absence—and a new and excellent conductor, Signor Giorgio Polacco, as Signor Panizza's colleague in place of Signor Campanini (not engaged), complete the record to date.

FRANCIS E. BARRETT.

THE DOVER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

On April 29 and 30 the fifth triennial Musical Festival, held under the auspices of the Dover Choral Union, took place in the Town Hall with conspicuous success. On both days large and interested audiences filled the hall, and the programmes were thoroughly appreciated.

The soloists were Miss Doris Carter, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop (vocalists), and Miss Leech-Carreras (violinist). The orchestra, ably led by Mr. George H. Wilby, did excellent work on the whole. They played Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony,' Smetana's 'The bartered bride' Overture, Dr. Haigh's Overture, and other works, most beautifully.

The principal interest of the performances centred in the presence of Sir Frederick Bridge and Sir Hubert Parry, to conduct respectively 'A Song of the English' and 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin'; and also in the production, under the direction of their composers, of new works by Kentish musicians.

The first of these was a beautiful setting of 'Ave Maria,' by W. L. Twinning (of Dover and Torquay), for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, a straightforward composition.

Mr. B. Luard-Selby (Rochester) was represented by a Ballad, 'The death of the old year,' for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra. The composer has very cleverly succeeded in catching the poet's spirit. There are many passages illustrating the playful character of the poem, although some of the humour is missed. The scoring is very effective.

A Miniature Suite for violin, organ and pianoforte, composed by Dr. E. J. Bellerby (Margate), was much appreciated. It was well played by Mr. Alfred Dixon, Mr. H. J. Taylor, and the composer.

These works were all produced on the Tuesday evening, the programme concluding with an excellent performance of Sir Frederick Bridge's 'A Song of the English,' a work which ought to become very popular. Kipling's words are most striking, and the music is equally fine.

On the Wednesday, Mr. W. W. Starmer's new cycle of part-songs was produced. They are four in number, viz., 'Queen and Huntress,' 'Waken, lords and ladies,' 'Pack, clouds, away,' and 'Twilight time.' These charming pieces were tastefully sung under the composer's direction, and were received with marked favour by the audience. They are all tuneful, fresh, and singable, and will doubtless be frequently heard.

A new Ballad for chorus and orchestra, 'The Battle of Inkermann,' by Mr. H. J. Taylor, had an enthusiastic reception. It is a setting of Charles Mackay's poem, and is full of varied expression, descriptive writing, and vivid orchestration.

A Concert-Overture in D minor, by Dr. Haigh (Ramsgate), was excellently played by the orchestra. It is written on classical lines; full of vivacity and fine orchestration, it created a most favourable impression.

The programme concluded with Sir Hubert Parry's 'The Pied Piper,' which the choir sang with evident delight.

At the close of the performance, Sir Hubert presented Mr. H. J. Taylor, conductor of the Choral Union and conductor-in-chief of the Festival, with a silver cigarette-box from the composer-conductors, as a token of their esteem.

THE SOUTH WALES MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

To replace the Cardiff Triennial Festival, which has lapsed this year, a series of concerts of Festival dimensions was arranged to take place at Swansea, Neath, Mountain Ash, and Newport, on April 21, 22, 23, 24, in each of which the Queen's Hall Orchestra and local Choral Societies should co-operate. That given at Swansea by the Swansea and District Male-Voice Choir was described in our last issue.

At the second concert, Neath Choral Society gave a more than creditable performance of Bantock's 'Omar Khayyam,' under the direction of Mr. T. Hopkin Evans. Though comparatively inexperienced in modern music, the choir sang as if undisturbed by the difficulty of the work, and the interpretation was one of real expressiveness. The solo parts were taken by Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony,' and Wagner's 'Meistersinger' Overture were also in the programme.

The concert given at Mountain Ash, on April 23, was of exceptional importance and interest, as Sir Edward Elgar was present to conduct his 'King Olaf.' In spite of the hindrance inevitably caused by the choir not being used to a new conductor, there was some high vitality and expressiveness in the choral singing, and the tone was conspicuously good in both quality and volume. The solo parts were taken by Miss Leah Felissa, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The composer and all who took part received an ovation that marked the triumph of those who had organized the Festival. In the programme of this concert was included Saint-Saëns's 'Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso' for violin, played by Mr. Steve Evans, and Edward German's 'Welsh Rhapsody.'

At the Newport concert, on April 24, an excellent performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' was given, under the direction of Mr. A. E. Sims, with Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. William Batey as soloists. The choral singing had many good qualities, notably when it rose to a climax. Some instrumental numbers completed the programme of a concert that proved a worthy termination of the Festival.

THE WAGNER FESTIVAL AT BRUSSELS.

The centenary of Richard Wagner's birth has already been celebrated in London and Paris, and indeed in most of the great Opera Houses in Europe, and Belgium has just shown us that she has no intention of lagging behind other nations in matters musical. Whilst Antwerp feted the occasion by giving two gala concerts, the Théâtre de la Monnaie at Brussels rejoiced the hearts of all Wagner-lovers with one performance of the entire 'Ring,' the 'Flying Dutchman,' 'Tristan and Isolde,' and a concert comprised of fragments from 'Parsifal,' along with Beethoven's ninth Symphony. When it was announced that world-famed singers like Ullrich, Bender, and Madame Fassbender-Mottl, and a conductor of the standing of Otto Lohse had been engaged, a brilliant and successful season was almost a foregone conclusion.

It was unfortunate that the Festival opened with the 'Flying Dutchman.' In the first place it is, after 'Rienzi,' the least Wagnerian of all Wagner's works; and, secondly, it requires a chorus—which, incidentally, was supplied by the Théâtre de la Monnaie. The members of the chorus accordingly, singing in French, engaged in dialogue with the principal actors, who, naturally, were singing in German! The success of the performance was greatly heightened by the admirable conducting of Herr Lohse.

The performances of the 'Ring' cycle were all interesting, and all on a high plane. A Wagner Festival like that of Brussels—where rehearsals were necessarily few—is less homogeneous than similar performances in Germany, where more heed is given to the general concord of the entire company. But a unique opportunity was afforded of hearing many of the world's best singers together on the same stage; and what they lacked in ensemble was amply atoned for in the fine quality of their singing and the subtlety of their technique.

London Concerts.

Peculiar interest was attached to the concert of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on April 23, by the revival of Goetz's beautiful and much-neglected Symphony in F. It was excellently played, and its charm of melody and refined orchestration gave welcome pleasure. Miss Isolde Menges was heard in an attractive performance of Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, and songs were given by Miss Gladys Gilderoy Scott. Mr. Arthur W. Payne conducted.

'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' was the principal number on a programme well carried out by the Central London Choral Society, at the Royal Academy of Music, on April 24. Under the direction of Mr. David J. Thomas, some expressive and bright-toned singing was provided, and agreeable interpretations of the 'Freischütz,' and 'Ruy Blas' Overtures were given by the orchestra. Miss Mina Caldwell sang pleasantly, and Mr. Harold Wilde was the tenor soloist.

In consequence of the great success of the Tchaikovsky concert given by the New Symphony Orchestra on March 29, an extra concert was arranged for April 27, when Mr. Landon Ronald conducted excellent performances of the 'Casse Noisette,' Suite, 'The Pathetic Symphony' and, with Mr. Mark Hambourg as soloist, the B flat minor Pianoforte concerto.

On April 29, Mr. Henschel made his first appearance as conductor of the Handel Society, and the concert, given at Queen's Hall, provided the first performance in England of his 'Requiem.' It proved unassuming music to modern ears, but dignified by high musicianship, felicity of idea, and beauty. The choir experienced little difficulty in giving a thoroughly efficient and expressive performance. The quartet of soloists consisted of Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. F. H. Grisewood. The programme included also Handel's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's day,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Solemn Prelude' for orchestra and organ.

The concert given by the Wilhelm Sachse Orchestra at Queen's Hall on May 1 had many points of excellence, chief among which were the performance of Dvorák's beautiful G major Symphony, and Beethoven's 'Emperor' concerto, given with Mr. Ernst von Lengyel as soloist. Songs were provided by Miss Phyllis Lett.

A concert was given at Queen's Hall, on May 6, by Mrs. Margaret Meredith, to commemorate the anniversary of the death of King Edward VII. The concert-giver's settings of Owen Seaman's 'The passing of Edward VII,' and of Kipling's 'Recessional,' and her 'Sursum Corda' were performed by the London Choral Society, under Mr. Arthur Fagge; and the first concert-performance in London of a song-cycle from her opera 'The pilgrim's way,' was given by Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Cecil Fanning (vocalists), Miss Edith Pennville (flautist), and Mr. Charles Draper (clarinetist). It consists of unadventurous, refined, melodious music. The remainder of the programme was carried out by the Farmer Road (Leyton) Girls' Choir, Señor Casals, and artists previously mentioned.

The Shapiro Ladies' Orchestra again showed their proficiency at Queen's Hall on May 7 in a programme that included the 'Meistersinger' Overture, Schumann's fourth Symphony, and Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte concerto (with Miss Myra Hess as soloist). Miss Phyllis Lett gave songs by Mrs. Reginald McKenna and Mr. G. H. Shapiro, the conductor.

A company of well-known artists assisted Madame Adelina de Lara in giving a concert at Bechstein Hall on May 1, with a programme that included a number of her compositions.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Chamber-music has been scarce in London lately, and the visit of the admirable Gelsoso Quartet to Bechstein Hall, on April 22, was therefore memorable. Their exceptional powers of refinement were shown in Mozart's Quartet in D minor, Debussy's in G minor, and Beethoven's in C sharp minor, Op. 131.

The concert of the Société des Concerts Français, at Bechstein Hall, on April 29, had the fascination that is always exercised by modern French music, interpreted by artists who understand it. Such are Madame Bathori-Engel (vocalist) and M. Ricardo Vines (pianist), who provided an attractive programme of works by Raymond, Bonheur, Ravel, Grovlez, Debussy, Albeniz, Hué, and de Breville.

At the 'Chelsea' concert, given by Mr. Tovey at Æolian Hall on April 29, it was interesting to hear duets of Brahms sung by Madame Noordewier and Madame de Haan, and an interpretation of Beethoven's 'Volkslieder' for two voices and pianoforte trio. The programme included also Brahms's Clarinet trio in B flat and his Quartet in A, the instrumentalists being Mr. Tovey (pianist), Mr. Adolph Busch (violinist), Mr. Ernest Tomlinson (violinist), Mr. Percy Such (violinist), and Mr. Charles Draper (clarinetist).

The London Trio, who gave a concert at Æolian Hall on May 7, again turned their attention to their favourite Brahms, and gave a highly-attractive interpretation of his C minor Trio. Schumann's Pianoforte quartet in E flat, given with Mr. Ernest Tomlinson as viola-player, and solo contributions by M. Pecsikai, the violinist of the Trio, and Miss Richenda Clayton (vocalist) completed the programme.

London is happily familiar with the results of the association of Messrs. Thibaud (violinist), Casals (violinist), and Bauer (pianist), and the re-appearance of these highly-inspired artists at Queen's Hall, on May 20, was a most welcome event. Nothing finer could be wanted than the interpretation which they gave of Beethoven's great B flat Trio, Op. 97. The intimate unity and sensitive beauty of their playing were memorable. Similar interpretations were given of Schumann's D minor Trio, Op. 63, and Dvorák's 'Dumka' Trio.

An interesting concert was given at Æolian Hall on May 20, by Miss Gwendolen Mason (harpist), in the course of which Ravel's 'Introduction and Allegro' for harp, flute, clarinet, and string quartet, was heard. Mr. Percy Heming sang Dr. Ethel Smyth's 'The dance,' 'Possession,' and 'The clown,' with accompaniment of harp and other instruments.

RECITALS.

Brahms's F major Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte was effectively played by M. Kolni-Belozky, a young violoncellist, and Mr. E. Howard-Jones, in the course of a joint recital at Bechstein Hall on April 21. A second recital was given by these artists on April 30. Mr. Theodore Byard's recital at the same hall, on the following day, served to introduce five 'Greek sea-prayers' by Blair Fairchild, which displayed considerable merit. Miss Susanne Morvay's pianoforte playing at Æolian Hall on April 22 was again astonishing in its maturity and technical ease.

An interesting song and sonata recital was given at Bechstein Hall on April 24 by Mrs. George Swinton, who sang Lieder with her accustomed expressiveness, Mr. Paul Kochanski (violinist), and Mr. Hamilton-Harty (pianist). The latter artists introduced a cleverly-written Sonata by Karol Szymanowski, and were heard also in Brahms's D minor Sonata.

Mr. Percy Grainger gave virile performances of Brahms's F minor Sonata and Franck's 'Prelude, Air and Finale,' at Æolian Hall on April 29, and introduced a characteristic piece by Mr. Cyril Scott.

Miss Elena Gerhardt, whose unsurpassable Lieder singing needs no description, gave a recital of Brahms, Erich Wolf, Hugo Wolf, and Strauss, at Bechstein Hall on May 2, with the additional attraction of accompaniments played by Herr Arthur Nikisch.

Mr. Harold Bauer gave his only pianoforte recital of the season at Bechstein Hall on May 8, and fully satisfied the high expectations of his many admirers present.

Considerable interest was aroused by the recital given on May 8, at the Royal Academy of Music, by Mr. Willie Hubert Davies, a young and exceptionally promising violin scholar of that institution. Over and above a sterling technique, he possesses notable powers of interpretation, as was shown in his performance of César Franck's Sonata in conjunction with Mr. Arthur Alexander. He was also heard in Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' It is gratifying to find that extra-youthful proficiency that is typical of the age exemplified in a player of British descent.

The brilliant powers of the adolescent pianist, Mr. Max Darewski, were displayed at Queen's Hall, on May 19, in Beethoven's third and Saint-Saëns's second Pianoforte concertos, which were given with the assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald.

Recitals were also given by Mr. Thomas Perceval Fielden (pianist), Miss Richenda Clayton (vocalist), Mr. Clay Thomas (vocalist), Mr. Packer-Ramsay (vocalist), Mr. Frederic Lamond (pianist) with a Beethoven programme, Madame Mervyl (vocalist), Miss Myrtle Meggy (pianist), Mr. Ernest Schelling (pianist), Miss Muriel Donne and Miss Ivy Parkin (violinist and pianist), Mr. Felix Salmon (violinist), Mr. Jules Wertheim (pianist), Miss May Fussell (violinist), Miss Helen Henschel (vocalist), Mr. Frank Gleeson (vocalist), Mr. Marcus Brownlow (vocalist), Miss Lucy Polgreen (pianist), Mrs. Harry Bedford (vocalist), Signor Aurelio Giorni (a young and able pianist), Mr. F. S. Kelly (pianist), Madame d'Onyskiewicz (vocalist), with a modern Russian programme, Miss Guiomar Novaes (pianist), Mr. Ernest Groom (vocalist), M. Georg von Lalewicz (pianist), M. Aurelio Giorni (pianist), Señor Joan Manen (violinist), Miss Helen Fayrebankes (vocalist), Mr. Fredric Fradkin (violinist), Mlle. Felia Dorio and Mr. Robert Pitt (vocalists), Mr. Thornely Gibson and Herr Edwin Fischer (vocalist and pianist), Mr. Boris Hambourg (violinist), Madame Julia Hostater (vocalist), Miss Lena Maitland (vocalist), Mr. Wesley Weyman (pianist), Mr. Arthur Rubinstein (pianist), Miss Munthe-Kaas (vocalist), Mlle. Renée Feutray and M. Marcel Bonnemain (vocalist and violinist).

A ballad concert was given in St. Bartholomew's Hall, Dalston Lane, on May 2, under the direction of Mr. Clement Meek, with the object of raising funds for improving the church organ, and the venture proved very successful both artistically and financially. Miss Aimée Evetts, Mrs. T. D. Keighly, Miss Winifred Meek, Miss Amy M. Parker (solo violin), Mr. S. H. Waterman, Mr. J. Mawdesley, Mr. Arthur Ward, and Mr. Clement Meek (solo pianoforte) were the principal contributors to an interesting programme.

The Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society brought its season to a close on May 3, with characteristically striking and attractive performances of Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' The solo parts were taken by Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Ella Caspers, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. Bridge Peters. Mr. Allen Gill conducted.

The Orpheus Choral and Orchestral Society deserves great credit for their performance of Dr. Walford Davies's cantata 'Everyman' at the Hampstead Conservatoire on May 8, for the work is one that deserves more frequent hearing, and their interpretation of it was one of high significance. The choral music had been well studied, and its execution was fluent and full of appropriate meaning. Good readings of the solo parts were given by Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Lydia John, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. Claud Powell conducted ably.

The Fulham and District Choral Society gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean,' at the Town Hall, on May 8. The choir sang with their usual fine tone and regard for light and shade. The principals were Miss Christine Bywater, Miss May Peters, Mr. Harold E. Wilde, and Mr. Herbert Tracey. Mr. George Wilby conducted, and Mr. Edgar Wilby led the Society's orchestra.

Mr. Ronald Dussek, organist of St. Matthew's Church, Surbiton, gave a concert at St. Matthew's Hall on May 14, consisting of his own MS. compositions and those of Johann Ladislaw Dussek (1761-1812).

Suburban Concerts.

Elgar's 'The Black Knight,' and Macfarren's 'The Lady of the Lake' (chosen in celebration of the Macfarren centenary), were successfully performed by Mr. Munro Davison's Choral Society at the Northern Polytechnic, Holloway, on April 24. The choir of eighty voices gave good effect to both works, and good help was given in the solo work, which was allotted to fifteen artists. Mr. Herbert Hodge was at the organ.

The popular 'A tale of Old Japan,' of Alfred Noyes and Coleridge-Taylor, was performed with great success by the Crystal Palace Musical Society on April 26. Mr. Walter W. Hedgecock, the conductor, produced some excellent effects from his able singers, and the audience, which was exceptionally large, showed great enthusiasm. The solo parts were taken by Miss Mary Leighton, Miss Maud Clough, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. George Baker.

A highly successful concert was given at Fulham Town Hall on April 26 by students—sixty in number—of the Fulham and Putney College of Music, of which Mr. H. V. Miniken is principal.

The Sunday School Union Choral Society gave their annual concert at Stepney Meeting Hall on April 29, under the direction of Mr. George Merritt.

The North Hackney Choral Society brought their first season to a very successful close on May 1. The choral works included Dunhill's 'Tubal Cain,' Fanning's 'Miller's wooing,' Leslie's 'The Pilgrims,' and other part-songs. These were all very ably given, although the balance of tone was marred by the shortage of tenors. There was good technique and expression, no doubt due to the training the choir had received from their conductor, Mr. Otley Marshall. The soloists were Miss Stella Farmer, Miss Marion Battisill, Mr. Edward Bennett, and Mr. Walter Kingsley (vocalists), and Miss Nora Freely (violinist).

BIRMINGHAM.

The most noteworthy of recent events was the week's operatic Festival, provided by the Quinlan Opera Company at the Theatre Royal, from April 28 to May 3, which consisted of the first performance in Birmingham of the complete cycle of Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelung,' in addition to the 'Meistersingers,' 'The Tales of Hoffmann,' and Verdi's 'Rigoletto.' The latter was specially staged for the appearance of Miss Felice Lyne in the part of Gilda. She also gave a most delightful and fascinating impersonation of the automaton Olympia. Quite an unprecedented interest was taken in the performance of Wagner's monumental music-dramas, the theatre being crowded nightly. Much of the success was due to the excellent orchestra, and to Herr Richard Eckhold's masterly conducting. The principal artists included Miss Perceval Allen, who made her début here in opera, and who was eminently suited for the part of Brünnhilde. The principal tenors were Mr. Francis MacLennan, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, and Mr. Spencer Thomas; the principal baritones and basses, Mr. Robert Parker, Mr. Graham Marx, and Mr. Karl von Cochem. The artistic personnel also included Mesdames Jeanne Brola, Edna Thornton, Alice Prowse, and Gladys Ancrum. The next visit of the Quinlan Opera Company will be on their return from a tour of South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand, probably in September or October, 1914.

The customary annual concert promoted by the students of the Midland Institute School of Music was held in the Town Hall on May 7, under the directorship of Professor Granville Bantock. Orchestral music was well represented, special interest being attached to the performance of Mr. Clarence Raybould's 'Symphonic Variations,' scored for full orchestra, and conducted by the composer, a former student of the School of Music. The work, which is still in manuscript, was written for his musical degree of Bachelor of Music conferred upon Mr. Clarence Raybould by the Birmingham University in 1912, he being the first recipient here of such an honour. The composition showed much inventive power and originality in orchestral colouring, and it created an excellent impression. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Characteristic Waltzes' Nos. 1 and 2, Op. 20, were splendidly performed, and a welcome item was Bach's Violin concerto in E, belonging to the Cöthen period (1717-23), accompanied by the strings, with the continuo given on the pianoforte by Mr. Clarence Raybould. Mr. Herbert Povey was the soloist. Rubinstein's Pianoforte concerto in D minor, Op. 70, was played by Mr. W. J. Harris.

The Ladies' Choir took part in the performance of Schubert's Choral Song, 'The Lord is my Shepherd' and Part III. of Professor Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon.' Songs were also given by Miss Marie Rowe, Miss Mary Foster, and Miss Elsie Yardley.

Our well-known local pianist, Mr. Arthur Cooke, who is rapidly making a name for himself all over the country, gave a highly interesting pianoforte recital in the Town Hall on May 8.

An account of the important Midland Musical Competition Festival, held in Birmingham, May 20 to 24 inclusive, is given in the 'Competition Festival Record.'

The customary three weeks' season of promenade concerts at the Theatre Royal, under Mr. Landon Ronald's conductorship, begins on Monday, June 2.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The winter season has now been brought to a close. There is, however, no actual cessation of musical events, but merely a slight decrease in the number of important fixtures, for the summer season has now been raised to a position that approximates very closely to that time of the year that is always supposed to be especially preserved for music-making, namely, those months which circle round the winter solstice. After so many weeks of strenuous effort, it is only natural that every one who is bound up with the welfare of the Winter Gardens should be somewhat jaded and languid, so that, although their energies may be requisitioned on not a few important occasions, it is at least fortunate for those who have worked so hard on our behalf throughout the winter that there is a noticeable decline in the number of serious orchestral concerts.

The serial concerts, comprising the Symphony Concerts and Monday 'Pops,' have each reached their appointed end. At the former series we have enjoyed capital performances of Sir Hubert Parry's new Symphony, a work of conspicuous worth and one in which our interest was enhanced by the presence of the composer in the rôle of conductor, and of Brahms's E minor Symphony, Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, and the Symphony No. 3 of Tchaikovsky, with which must be coupled the following attractive works, Elgar's 'Froissart' Overture and Arthur Herve's symphonic variations entitled 'Life Moods.' Soloists of substantial merit have been forthcoming in the persons of Miss Marian Jay (Brahms's Violin concerto), Dr. Rumshisky (Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto in G minor), Mr. Max Mossel (Violin concerto in A by Sinding), and Mr. Cecil Baumer (Rubinstein's Pianoforte concerto in D minor).

So far as the Monday 'Pops,' are concerned, it is only necessary to record that on April 21 a Beethoven programme was given, of which the first Symphony and the Trio for flute, bassoon, and pianoforte—played by Messrs. Gennin, Chapman, and Birch, members of the Orchestra—were the principal features, and that at the concerts on April 28 and May 5, the programme represented Saint-Saëns and Tchaikovsky, respectively.

On May 15, Sir Charles Stanford was welcomed as conductor of his incidental music to 'Drake'; it was the first concert performance of the Suite, and made many friends by reason of its invigorating qualities. The remainder of the programme consisted of Beethoven's Symphony in F, Sibelius's 'Finlandia' tone-poem, and two movements from Brahms's Horn trio, which were given by Messrs. Trevisone, F. King-Hall, and Montague Birch, of the Municipal Orchestra.

A spirited performance of Edward German's 'Merrie England' was given by the Municipal Choir and Orchestra, under the composer's baton, on April 22, the soloists being Miss Agnes Christa, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. John Roberts, and Mr. David Brazell.

A fair sprinkling of heterogeneous concerts has met the varied tastes of the different sections of the community, visits having been paid by Melsa (orchestral concert), Miss Elisabeth Munthe-Kaas (vocal recital), Madame Blanche Marchesi and Mr. Mark Hambourg (recital), Mr. Percy Grainger (orchestral concert), Miss Marie Hall (orchestral concert), Mr. Thorpe Bates (vocal recital), and Miss Adela Verne (orchestral concert). The third visit within a few months of the Russian Ballet spoke volumes as to the reality of the revival of dancing as a potent attraction in the world of entertainment.

BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

Clifton Male-Voice Choir gave their eighth annual concert on April 24, at Redland Park Hall, and under the direction of Mr. Walter P. Price gave several part-songs, to the gratification of a large audience. Miss Winifred Thomas and Miss Gwladys Carling sang, and Mr. Maurice Alexander played violin solos with ability.

There was an excellent orchestral concert at the Victoria Rooms on April 25, Mr. George Riseley conducting admirably. In Tchaikovsky's Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, and Paderewski's 'Polish Fantasia,' the solo parts were finely played by Miss Mildred Pritchard, an accomplished Bristol pianist. Other works in the programme were Beethoven's Overture, 'Leonora' No. 3, Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie No. 1, in F, Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's dance,' and the Overture to 'Tannhäuser.' These were interpreted with great effect, and much appreciated.

A concert held by the West Bristol Choral Society, on April 26, at the Victoria Rooms, attracted a large audience. Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride' was creditably given, under Mr. Charles Read's direction, the principal vocalists being Miss Elizabeth Morgan, Mr. Herbert Thompson, and Mr. Graham Smart. The second part of the concert was a miscellaneous selection.

On April 28, Clifton Choral Society gave a pleasing concert at St. John's Parish Hall, White Ladies Road, under the direction of Mr. A. Ernest Hill. Anderton's cantata 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' was agreeably performed, the soloists being Miss Gladys M. Dyer, Mr. H. Aston, and Mr. Stanley Hill, and there were songs by Miss Dyer, Miss A. M. Goad, Miss Ethel Barnard, Miss Margaret C. Dennis, Mr. E. Redwood, Mr. L. E. C. Baker, and Mr. E. Reginald Hill. Pianoforte pieces were contributed by Miss Hettie Applegate and Mr. A. Ernest Hill.

The third concert of the sixth season was given on May 7, by the Bristol Symphony Orchestra at the Victoria Rooms, Mr. Herbert Parsons conducting. Brahms's third Symphony, Mendelssohn's Violin concerto (Mr. Percival Hodgson the soloist) and Grieg's Overture 'In Autumn' were adequately interpreted. Mr. Lionel Dore sang with effect in the final scene from Wagner's 'Die Walküre.'

On April 24, the Yatton Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. Edward Pavey, gave a performance of 'Elijah' in the Parish Church. The soloists were Miss Amy Perry, Miss Beatrice Crabbe, Mr. Francis Wensley, and Mr. Robert Burchill.

Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society terminated their forty-eighth season on May 8, with a concert at the Knightstone Pavilion, under the able direction of Mr. Edward Cook. The principal works given were Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean' and Elgar's 'Songs from the Bavarian Highlands.' Miss Mary Leighton and Mr. Charles Tree were the principal vocalists. The performance afforded gratification to a numerous audience.

In honour of the late Wilhelm Kuhe, it is proposed to found a Kuhe Memorial Scholarship at the Brighton School of Music, open to students of pianoforte playing. The secretaries of the committee are Mr. Richard Northcott, 29, Upper Hamilton Terrace, N.W., and Mr. Sydney Harper, 148, North Street, Brighton.

CAMBRIDGE.

On February 14 the University Musical Society performed Verdi's 'Requiem.' Both the choir and the orchestra showed very remarkable progress. Later in the term Dr. Naylor conducted a performance of his own work 'Fax Dei,' which was noticed in our issue for April. Perhaps the most notable achievement in the term's music was a performance by the University Musical Society's orchestra, under Dr. Rootham, of Beethoven's seventh Symphony, with an almost negligible amount of professional assistance. The Society's chamber concerts were given in the Guildhall and on a much larger scale than formerly. They included a visit by the Brussels Quartet and a concert of music by Handel, Hadyn and Mozart, for a chamber orchestra, formed by members of the Society's orchestra. A pianoforte recital by Signor Busoni was the outstanding feature among the usual number of professional concerts.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

An excellent programme of unaccompanied choral music was selected by Dr. Harold Lake for the annual concert of the Mutley Baptist Choir, which took place on April 30. The high training of the choral singers was well exhibited in Tchaikovsky's 'Angel spirits ever blessed,' Elgar's 'How calmly the evening,' Bach's 'I wrestle and pray,' Mendelssohn's 'Judge me, O God,' and choruses by Leslie and Handel. Rheinberger's Trio for organ, violin and violoncello was played by Dr. Lake, Mr. Percy Lowman, and Miss Winifred Blight.

The choir of Ebrington Street United Methodist Chapel sang Gaul's 'Ruth' on May 4, assisted by an orchestra, the performers numbering eighty. The choral singing was hearty, and good in tone and rhythm.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Axe Vale Musical Society, numbering forty voices, gave a concert on April 17, when Mr. W. C. Walton conducted part-songs and choruses. Kingsbridge Wesleyan Choir sang anthems at their concert, also on April 17, and the choir of Newton Abbot Baptist Church gave a miscellaneous programme on the same date, Mr. T. H. R. Player conducting. Seaton Glee Choir gave a successful concert on April 21, directed by Mrs. C. R. Mason and Miss Oldridge; and the St. Cecilia Singers of Axminster contributed glees, on April 23, to a programme consisting chiefly of orchestral pieces by Handel, Gounod, Balfe, Sullivan, &c., by an orchestra of twenty-five, conducted by Mr. A. Norman Kendall. The choirs of the Nonconformist Chapels of Brixham amalgamated to give a sacred concert on April 23, and admirably sang anthems and choruses. Beer Glee Society formed a choral class of fifty voices and sang 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' and part-songs on April 25. The soloists were Mrs. Hurford and Mr. Sutton Jones. Mr. W. C. Wotton conducted. St. Mary's Parish Choir of fifty voices, at Chard, sang 'The Holy City,' on April 25, assisted by an orchestra, and conducted by Mr. A. T. Maynard. Also on April 25, a singing contest for junior members was held at the annual closing concert of the Black Torrington Choral Society, Eveline Sanders and H. Chapman being the first-prize winners among the girls and boys respectively. Mr. S. Pochin conducted an excellent programme of part-songs and choruses sung by Newton Abbot Congregational Choir on April 28; and Budleigh Salterton Wesleyan Choir gave a concert on May 1. The Isca Glee Singers performed several glees and quartets at Seaton on May 2; and the Kelly Quartet contributed to a concert at Tavistock on May 5.

At their twenty-first annual concert, on April 25, Teignmouth Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. A. J. James, numbered thirty-three performers and played an ambitious programme, including Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture, and pieces by Brahms and Massenet. Exeter Orchestral Society closed the season on April 29 with a performance of Dvorák's 'From the New World' Symphony, Sibelius's 'Finlandia,' and Beethoven's 'Coriolan' Overture. Dr. Wood conducted, and Miss May Bartlett was the vocalist.

A delightful chamber concert was given at Exeter on April 24 by Miss Ruby Davy (violin), Canon Cary-Elwes (violoncello) and Rev. C. W. Smith (pianoforte), with the assistance of Mr. A. G. Wills, vocalist.

Two performances were given on April 23 and 29 of 'H.M.S. Pinafore,' at Ashburton, by Mrs. Herring-Mason's Operatic Society.

It is with a definite sense of bereavement that one reports the disbanding of the Torquay Musical Society. For the last twenty years this combination of orchestral and choral forces has done invaluable work for the district, and has certainly for a long period stood for the highest in art, and has aimed at an artistic standard of performance. The works selected for study have invariably been taken from among the best, and an earnest purpose has inspired the workers. The reason given for the collapse is 'lack of public support.' This memorial cannot be closed without a tribute to the artistic and careful work through many years of Mr. T. H. Webb, who resigned the conductorship two years ago owing to failure of health; nor without expression of hope that the cessation of the work of the Society may be temporary.

CORNWALL.

Many glee parties, male choirs, and choral Societies have sprung up in quiet country districts of Cornwall as the result of the County Music Competitions, founded four years ago. Though these appearances must be regarded in many cases as tentative, they are encouraging to those who labour for the good of the people by the spread of the elevating art of music. It was most gratifying to find the ambitious effort of Perranporth and District Choral Society to perform 'Elijah' was amply justified by the standard reached on April 17, for the success achieved exceeded anything they had previously attained.

Mr. W. J. Johnston conducted, and the choir sang with good precision and attention to light and shade, and with dramatic spirit in the 'Baal' numbers. Mr. Matthew Clemens gave invaluable assistance on the organ, and the principal singers were Miss W. Carter, Mrs. Treddinnick, and Messrs. Truscott and Old. Parts I. and II. of the 'Hiawatha' trilogy were admirably sung by Tywardreath Choral Society on April 17, under the conductorship of Mr. Brennard Smith. St. Ives Malé Quartet, who at the recent County Competitions won the first prize for the third year in succession, sang at a concert on April 14, at Carbis Bay; and on the same date Marazion Male-Voice Choir gave a concert at Gwinear, Mr. J. H. Trudgeon conducting. A Service of Song was performed by Rock United Methodist Choir on April 17, with such musical success as showed them to be a choir of good capabilities. Mr. James Andrews conducted. Land's End Choral Society, on April 19, at Sennen, sang the test-pieces with which they had won certificates at the County Competitions, Miss E. E. Carter conducting. Gunnislake Male Choir sang choruses, and selections were played by an orchestra on April 22, and the choir gave another concert on May 7, at Albaston. To sing Mendelssohn's '95th Psalm' on April 25, the choirs of the Wesleyan and United Methodist Churches of Bude amalgamated under the direction of Mr. J. H. Treleven. Some excellent singing was accomplished by Mousehole Male Choir on April 27, and on the same date Torpoint Wesleyan Choir gave a sacred concert, conducted by Mr. C. Broad. A new choral combination, named Cawsand and Kingsand Male-Voice Choir, has been organized at these little fishing villages, under Mount Edgumbe Park. The first concert on May 2, conducted by Mr. S. Langdon, was in every way a success. A sacred concert was given by Redruth Primitive Methodist Choir, on May 4, Mr. S. Nicholas directing at the organ. The singers attained their chief success in the anthem, 'Be Thou exalted.' The children of Camborne district school, and other competitors in the County Competitions, gave concert-performances of the test-music at Camborne on May 7, Mr. Fred Luke organizing and conducting. The recently formed Orpheus Choir at Looe sang part-songs on May 14, with creditable effect, and Looe Male Quartet contributed to the same programme.

A varied selection of music was played by the Looe Orchestral Society on April 24, when Mr. T. H. Northam conducted the players in pieces by Zehle, Aletter, Suppé, Seebold, and Joyce. The Looe Male Quartet also contributed. Though working so far away from musical opportunity, the Penzance Orchestral Society are doing an unsuspected amount of good for the people and for music in their isolated corner. Under their conductor, Mr. Walter Barnes, they study seriously and with perseverance works of high standard, and too much praise cannot be given them for the artistic and capable manner in which, on May 5, they played the Grieg Concerto in A for orchestra and pianoforte (Miss Ethel Tonking being the soloist), the characteristic dance numbers from the 'Casse Noisette Suite' and the Dream Pantomime from 'Hänsel und Gretel.' It was refreshing to meet players so earnest and artistic in spirit and performance. The vocalist was Miss Fiffine de la Côte, and the proceeds of the concert were given to the Cornwall County Music Competitions Society. At the annual meeting of this Society on May 13, it was reported that the debt which rested on the funds was that which had been incurred in the organization of the first year's work and the first year's competitions. The annual Festivals now practically paid for themselves, but it was most desirable that this initial debt should be cleared off. Lady Mary Trefusis was re-elected hon. secretary of an influential committee.

DUBLIN.

On April 23, the Dublin Orchestral Society gave the third concert for the season in the Gaiety Theatre. César Franck's Symphony in D minor—which was played here for the first time—created a deep impression. The 'Egmont' Overture, the love scene from Berlioz's 'Romeo and Juliet,' Bach's choral prelude, 'Wachet auf,' arranged by Dr. Esposito for orchestra, and Svendsen's 'Carneval in Paris,' completed the programme.

The visit of the Quinlan Opera Company from May 12 to 17, was memorable for the first performances in Ireland of Wagner's 'Ring' in its entirety. The Festival was very successful. The performances were interesting to Dublin folk, as several Dublin people have been engaged for the tour, including Miss Nita Edwards, who was one of the Rhine Maidens in 'Rheingold' and 'Götterdämmerung,' and a Valkyrie in 'Die Walküre.'

The Sunday Concerts at Woodbrook were resumed on May 4. The programmes have included Mendelssohn's 'Italian,' Beethoven's No. 1, and Mozart's in E flat, Symphonies. The soloists have been Miss Edith Mortier, and Mr. T. W. Hall (vocalists), and Miss Fanny Davies, the well-known pianist.

The Feis Ceoil began on May 19, too late for a report in this number.

EDINBURGH.

A unique opportunity was afforded some two thousand people of hearing Mendelssohn's 'Festgesang' performed by a male-voice choir in St. Cuthbert's Church on May 18. Mr. Robert Burnett was soloist. The choir, containing many professionals, was specially organized for the occasion—namely, a Masonic Service. The accompaniments were supplied by the organ, brass, and drums, and Mr. Cowie conducted. The climaxes were at times thrilling. With the exception of a performance of Félicien David's 'The Desert,' by the male members of Mr. Moonie's choir last year, and the same work some years previously, Edinburgh audiences have had no opportunities of realising the dramatic possibilities of such male-voice combinations.

It is with regret we notice the retirement of Mr. Collinson, organist of St. Mary's Cathedral, from the conductorship of the Royal Choral Union. A record of his arduous labours with this Society has appeared from time to time in these pages for the last thirty years. No conductor in the city is so affectionately spoken of by his choristers, and into all his oratorio performances he breathed that spirit of reverence which is sadly lacking in many modern interpretations.

The National Brotherhood Festival will take place at the Crystal Palace on August 30, when the Festival Male-voice Choir will sing on the Handel Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. G. William Williams. Choral competitions will also be held.

LIVERPOOL.

The centenary of Wagner's birth was fittingly celebrated in Liverpool, thanks to Mr. Quinlan's enterprise, by a first complete performance of the 'Ring of the Nibelungen,' which was given in the Royal Court Theatre during the week commencing May 5. It may be thought a tardy recognition, as far as Liverpool is concerned. We are, however, not entirely ignorant of the 'Ring,' as the 'Valkyrie' and 'Siegfried' have been given here before.

For the performances, Mr. Quinlan provided vocal principals of high repute, and an adequate orchestra of sixty-five, which overflowed into the stalls of the theatre and was accordingly far too visible. This, however, could not be helped, and the fine array of players, which Mr. Eckhold ably conducted, was also noticeable for the quality of its wind instruments, both wood and brass. Special scenery was built for Liverpool by Messrs. Elkan Bros., and everything was done to accommodate the mechanical demands of the dramas to the limited resources available. Under the existing conditions, the performances were a great success, although there might have been more crowded audiences.

The vocalists who filled the principal rôles included Miss Florence Easton (who distinguished herself as Sieglinde), Miss Perceval Allen (an admirable Brünnhilde), Miss Jeanne Brola, Miss Alice Prowse, and Miss Gladys Ancrum.

The principal male members of the cast were Mr. Spencer Thomas (Siegfried), Mr. MacLennan (Siegfried), Mr. Robert Parker (Wotan), Mr. C. Magrath (Hunding), Mr. Graham Marr (Gunter), Mr. K. von Cochem (Hagen), Mr. W. J. Samuël (Alberich), Mr. Meux and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly (Loge). Of the four performances, those of the 'Valkyrie' and 'Siegfried' were exceptionally good.

On the evening preceding the 'Ring,' Verdi's 'Rigoletto,' with Miss Felice Lyne as Gilda, was played, and another indication of the necessity of catering for the popular taste in view of treasury requirements, was later given in the choice of 'Tales of Hoffmann' and 'Faust.' Both performances, given at lower rates of admission, drew large audiences.

The visit of the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company to the Royal Court Theatre, after an absence of two years, was very successful, and the excellent performances of 'The Mikado,' 'Pinafore,' 'Trial by Jury,' &c., earned special appreciation.

At the annual meeting of the Rodewald Concert Club a satisfactory financial report was adopted. In criticising the season's programmes, Father Burge suggested that modern music seemed to have had more than its fair share, and in particular he advocated the claims of English song writers. The chairman, Dr. C. W. Hayward, agreed that they ought to encourage native compositions, but music was international. The object of the Club was to provide the best music by the best performers who could be secured. Their interesting chamber concerts had been the means of introducing several excellent local players and singers to public notice. Dr. A. W. Polliti was re-elected hon. treasurer of the Club, of which Mr. Ernest Bryson was re-elected Chairman.

The annual general meeting of the Philharmonic Society, which was held on May 16, passed off expeditiously and harmoniously, lasting a bare half-hour. There was a noticeable absence of any contention. In the printed statement of the accounts for the past season, the receipts from the subscriptions to the boxes, stalls, and galleries were £5,361, and the expenditure £4,560, which included a sum of £3,116 for band, organist, and conductors, and £965 for principal artists. For the hire of the Hall £1,391 was received, and the debit balance remaining on the cost of reconstruction was reduced from £1,505 to £1,315. Sir Frederic Cowen having resigned the permanent conductorship, which he has held for sixteen seasons, it is not at present intended to appoint another permanent conductor, and the committee have consequently engaged 'guest' conductors for the ensuing season, in accordance with recent procedure which has added a new and varied interest to the concerts. The chairman (Mr. Nicholson) remarked that the committee regarded the financial side of the report—although important—as secondary to the interests of musical art, and it was generally considered that last season was eminently satisfactory from a musical point of view. Engagements for next season had been made with Sir Frederic Cowen to conduct four concerts, M. Safonoff

(two), Mr. Landon Ronald (two), M. Gabriel Pierné (one), and M. Rachmaninoff (one). Probably Mr. Busoni and Mr. Albert Coates would be added to the list.

At the meeting of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, held on May 19, to discuss preliminaries for the thirteenth Festival in December next, it was announced that Sir Hubert Parry had accepted the committee's invitation to attend the Festival. If unable to write a composition specially for the occasion, owing to the pressure of his many engagements, Sir Hubert will conduct the performance on Festival scale of his anthem, 'Hear My words,' and the final chorus from 'Judith,' 'Put off, O Jerusalem.' Nine compositions having been sent in by local composers, at the invitation of the committee, the manuscripts were submitted to Sir Hubert Parry, whose recommendation of a work which he considered suitable fell on a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, composed by Mr. Samuel Lees, organist of St. Andrew's, Bebington, which will accordingly be sung at the Festival.

The Lord Bishop of Liverpool has requested the Church Choir Association to organize a surpliced choir of 1,000 men and boys formed from choirs which have taken part in the annual Festivals, to sing at the ceremony of the opening of the new Gladstone Dock, for which purpose their Majesties The King and Queen will visit Liverpool on July 11. In addition to a short service, including choral responses and a hymn, the great choir will sing two patriotic choruses by native composers, which have been finely chosen in Elgar's 'Land of Hope and Glory' and H. Hugo Pierson's 'Ye Mariners of England.' The band of H.M. Irish Guards will provide the accompaniments, and Mr. Burstall, Cathedral organist, will conduct.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

A retrospect of the Beethoven Amateur Orchestral Society has been issued in celebration of the completion of twenty-five years' work under the one conductor, Mr. E. Gordon Cockrell. The Society was established in 1888, with Sir Charles Hallé as its first president and there are still six active playing members who have been in from the start. The objects were laid down as 'the study and performance of such classical and other high-class music as comes within the scope of amateur ability.' In its initial season the numbers rose from 21 to 63, and its weekly rehearsals have gone on without cessation, the late Dr. Henry Watson taking the baton on the few occasions when Mr. Cockrell was absent. During the Orchestra's third season Mr. John Coates sang for the first time in Manchester and, too, on amateur. Attempts to run in co-operation with the Choral Society proved unsuccessful, and were abandoned in 1893. On the demolition of the old 'Gentlemen's Concert Hall' (the Midland Hotel now standing on this site), the Beethoven Society sought refuge in the Town Hall, where its concerts have since been given, the artistic mind finding pleasure in the renowned Ford Madox Brown frescoes on its walls, no less than in the music. Not content with always paying its way, the Society has raised approximately £1,300 for various charitable institutions in this period. Amateur organizations are not the easiest things in the world to keep alive, for enthusiasms are not always keen, and in this connection it may be remarked as somewhat singular that not merely this Beethoven body, but similar organizations in such centres as Bolton, Rochdale, Oldham, Blackburn, should not have more fully appreciated the benefits accruing from the preparation for and participation in the bigger Lancashire competitive Festivals where orchestral classes are a regular feature.

The Manchester Musical Society has had a most successful season artistically, and is evidently being managed in an enlightened spirit; nobody else in Manchester would tackle the style of work performed at its concerts, and suggestions have been made that publishing be added to its other activities. Arrangements for next winter are already in an advanced state. Balling is to lecture to the members, and there are to be concerts by Mr. Harold Brewerton and Miss Dorothy Silk; a wind-quintet evening arranged by the Hallé bassoon-player, Mr. A. Camden; recitals by Mr. Francis Harford and Mr. Baynton Power, and an evening of Mr. J. H. Foulds's work.

The 170-year-old Gentlemen's Concerts Society has escaped a deficit and is making its usual lavish preparations for the next winter. Rachmaninoff, Gervase Elwes, Vivian Burrows (a young Lancastrian violinist, commended both by Richter and Balling), Muriel Foster, Münthe Kaas, Tina Lerner, are booked, and not by any means the least interesting will be the appearance of two of Joachim's nieces, the Sisters von Aranyi, one of whom has inherited her uncle's famous 'Strad.'

During the summer months the Henry Watson Music Library, taken over by the Manchester Corporation Libraries on Dr. Watson's death, is to be re-arranged, classified, and catalogued. The number of borrowers has grown from 300 to about 2,000, and the absence of complete cataloguing has been seriously felt. During last season an attempt was made to add full scores of works not already in the Library, which were being performed at Hallé's; in the near future, the Libraries committee hopes to add more modern scores, so essential to present-day students.

During April, the third triennial testing of the voices in the Hallé Choir was completed, 400 singers having passed before Mr. R. H. Wilson, who reports that the results have been more satisfactory than on previous occasions, both in vocal quality and musical efficiency; many young voices from 18 to 25 years of age have been drafted in of late years, and Mr. Wilson records that Manchester can find plenty of tenors. He is probably under a misapprehension when stating that 'no other Society in the country—perhaps in the world—was called upon to do the work of the Hallé Choir in the same amount of time.' If it were true, it would hardly be a matter for congratulation, for it is notorious that some of the choral concerts in the later years under Dr. Richter were quite inadequately rehearsed. Better fewer works perfectly done than a greater number indifferently performed.

It will not be known what are the prospective Hallé arrangements until about mid-June; but opera promises to play an unusually important part in early October, when, under the Denhof management, Balling and Cortolezis will conduct the 'Ring' dramas, and 'Elektra' and 'Rosenkavalier.' At the latter end of April, the Carl Rosa Opera Company paid one of its most successful visits to Manchester. In Messrs. Fleischer, Neville, and Wegener, they have a trio of most capable singers, and Miss Hill and Miss Miranda also are really of the first-class. Mr. Walter van Noorden, in addition to conducting, manages to find time for propagandist work, although his ingenuity in this respect is not equal to that of Mr. Charles Manners. Still, on the eve of their recent Manchester visit, Mr. Van Noorden met the members of the active Playgoers' Club in this city, and gave them and the Manchester public a good 'straight talk.' He said that here the Carl Rosa Company had to depend mainly on the support of the foreigners (this being true of other centres too); he must rely on 'Carmen,' 'Faust,' 'Trovatore' to pull them through the week, there never being good houses for 'Lohengrin.' Then, every new work that was produced in Manchester was religiously condemned by 'a certain newspaper'—Mr. Van Noorden appearing to hold the quaint view that, as newspapers were commercial undertakings, the company which gave the biggest advertisement got the best and longest notice.

Now, it is patent that folks who are accustomed to good orchestral playing all through the winter, find the average operatic orchestra comparatively tame, and frankly the good singing usually provided by the Carl Rosa company is worthy of much better orchestral playing; still, the fact is becoming more and more evident that in the North opera is being more appreciated. At Blackpool, the centre of one of the ablest-managed competitive Festivals, the Carl Rosa Company played for one week at Christmas and the New Year, 1911; for twelve days same period, 1912; and has been booked for a three-weeks' season for this year-end. Opera seasons can be arranged on a cheaper season-ticket basis if the theatres are big enough to accommodate big audiences; and if the price is right, people will go in large numbers. That is the crux of the whole business: meet the music-hall on its own ground, and the box-office phase of the operatic problem is practically solved.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

To tour the globe with Wagner's 'Ring' is a task of great magnitude, and Mr. Quinlan is to be honoured for his boldness in grappling with its difficulties. After some weeks of rehearsing in the immediate locality, the initial performance of the Tetralogy was given in the Tyne Theatre on April 23 and the three successive nights. In spite of a few minor mishaps, the stage matters ran smoothly, and except for a few inequalities in the personnel, the performances reached a high level. In 'Rheingold' and 'Walküre' the cast was almost uniformly excellent, both dramatically and vocally. 'Siegfried'—perhaps the most externally-attractive of the four dramas—received also a fine interpretation; but 'Götterdämmerung' fell much below the level of the others. Mr. Robert Parker's conception of Wotan robbed the baffled god of the boredom anti-Wagnerites credit him with, and made him a truly noble figure—commanding, dignified, and heroic. As his warring spouse, Madame Edna Thornton was responsible for some of the most enjoyable singing of the week. She appeared also as Erda and Waltraute with commanding success. Miss Perceval Allen had a difficult task in replacing Miss Agnes Nicholls, who was such a splendid Brinnhilde in 'Die Walküre,' on the company's last visit, but her performance was very satisfactory. Miss Florence Easton made a charming 'Sieglinde,' and her husband, Mr. Francis MacLennan, was buoyant and invigorating in the title-rôle of 'Siegfried.' Great disappointment was caused by his non-appearance in the concluding drama. Neither of the Nibelungs was physically proportionate, but Mime was cleverly portrayed by Mr. Sydney Russell, although the cunning of the dwarf was not insisted on sufficiently, and Mr. W. J. Samuell and Mr. Graham Marr, who shared the part of Alberich, were both dramatic and effective. Mr. Maurice D'Oisly gave a skilful interpretation of the difficult part of Loge, and Misses Alice Prowse, Nita Edwards, and Mabel Dennis were vocally and personally as attractive as daughters of the Rhine should be. Mr. Richard Eckhold piloted his forces through the perils of a first performance with great skill, and secured a restrained and well-balanced rendering of the orchestral part of the score. 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Tales of Hoffmann,' and 'Rigoletto' were also staged.

Miss Victoria Hopper, a local lady who possesses a voice well adapted for coloratura singing, and who has been studying at the Royal College and abroad, gave a recital on April 30, and received an enthusiastic welcome.

The Choir of Elswick Road Wesleyan Church gave another performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' on Sunday, May 4, and attracted a large audience. Mr. H. Y. Dodds was the organist, and his brother, Mr. George Dodds, who conducted, is to be congratulated on the excellent standard attained by his choir.

On Saturday afternoon, May 17, in connection with the local section of the I.S.M., Brahms's second Pianoforte quartet was played by Mr. W. G. Whittaker (pianoforte), Messrs. J. Mark, J. Tucker, and J. Griffiths (strings), and Mr. T. Henderson gave an illustrative talk. Mr. C. F. Lloyd, a well-known amateur, occupied the chair.

Announcements for next season are: Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union; Dr. Walford Davies's 'Song of St. Francis' (conducted by the composer), 'The Hymn of Praise,' and an unaccompanied concert. Tynemouth, Whitley and District Choral Union: 'Elijah,' the German 'Requiem,' and Schubert's 'Rosamunde' music. Armstrong College Choral Society: Bach's Church cantata, 'Thou Guide of Israel,' eight-part motet, 'The Spirit also helpeth us,' and Von Holst's 'The Cloud Messenger.'

NORWICH.

The concert of the Philharmonic Society on May 8, was the occasion of an interesting and gratifying function—the presentation of plate and a cheque to Dr. Bates in recognition of his twenty-five years' service as organist at the Cathedral and of his inspiring influence on music in Norwich. The musical programme, which he directed as conductor of the Society, contained Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, impressively interpreted, and Mozart's D minor Pianoforte concerto. Miss Guiomar Novaes, the youthful pianist, played with astonishing maturity and purity of expression. Songs were given in refined manner by Mrs. George Swinton. Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' in which the Norwich Choral Society took an efficient part, brought the concert to an excellent ending. The organist was Dr. Bunnett.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

For the most part the season has concluded, but a few events of interest occurred at the latter end of April.

Miss Feilman's pupils' concert, on April 14, was noticeable for the great vocal promise of those who took part. The programme concluded with a sacred cantata for choir and soli, entitled 'Bethlehem,' by Carl Reinecke.

At Grantham, on April 16, Miss Emily Hart, ably assisted by Mr. Sydney Brook (violinist) and Mr. E. C. H. Elsmore (pianist), gave a delightful and interesting vocal recital. Miss Hart's selection included a song-cycle by W. Y. Hurlstone.

On April 17, the students at the University College here, gave their annual concert, under the direction of Professor Henderson. The chief item of interest was a fine performance of Stanford's 'Revenge,' in which the choir gave an excellent account of themselves. Mr. Farnsworth and Miss Ivy Bonnell contributed songs. The choir, which was nearly two hundred strong, gave a fine performance of a number of part-songs by Sullivan and Elgar. The ladies' voices were heard to great advantage in Elgar's 'The Snow,' and an excellent performance of Mozart's motet, 'O God, when Thou appearest,' brought the concert to a conclusion. The orchestra which supported the choir played a charming minuet by Elgar, and Järnefeldt's 'Preludeum.'

The Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society have issued their programme for next season, which includes performances of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' with Miss Gleeson-White, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Stewart Gardiner, on November 26; 'Messiah,' with Miss Alice Baxter, Miss Violet Oppenshaw, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. Robert Radford, on December 26; Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch,' with Miss Laura Evans Williams, Miss Joan Ashley, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Bridge Peters, on February 12; and Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' and Dr. Lyon's 'Man of Sorrows,' with Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. John Cheetham, Mr. Percy Hemming, and Mr. Thorpe Bates, on March 26.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—The Madrigal Choir concluded its thirty-second season on Saturday, April 26, when the programme included two fine madrigalian examples, 'Flora gave me fairest flowers' (Wilbye), and Morley's 'Fire, fire, my heart,' and representative part-songs by Bantock, Balfour Gardiner, Stanford, Coleridge-Taylor, Rutland Boughton, and Cowen. An unusual departure was the inclusion of examples of Church music, namely, Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' T. Tertius Noble's 'Fierce raged the wild billow' and 'Souls of the righteous,' and Martin's 'Holiest, breathe.' During the past season the Madrigal Choir has studied and performed some thirty-three examples of part-songs and madrigals representing all schools of writing, and the general standard of performance has been one of real excellence, which reflects to the credit of the Society and their conductor, Mr. Arthur Collingwood. At a recent concert of the Aberdeen Male Choir the programme included Brahms's 'Alto Rhapsody,' with Miss Maggie Kirkbride as soloist, J. R. Dear's 'Songs of the open air,' with Mr. John Cooper as soloist, and representative part-songs by Vaughan Williams, Granville Bantock, Coleridge-Taylor, MacDowell, Brewer, and others. Mr. A. Collingwood conducted, and played accompaniments. A performance of the 'Messiah' was given on April 16, with the object of aiding the new building scheme of the Sick Children's Hospital, and a committee representing various musical Societies of the city was responsible for the inception and carrying out of the scheme. The choir and orchestra of 400 were conducted by Mr. Collingwood. The soloists were Miss Nessie MacDougal, Miss Betty Watt, Mr. W. E. Gauld, and Mr. William Arthur. Mr. Mr. Burwood Nichols was at the organ.

BRUTON (SOMERSET).—The eighteenth annual concert of the Choral Society took place on May 8, when Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was performed. The work aroused great interest. The second part of the programme was devoted to some excerpts from Act 3 of 'Lohengrin,' including the Overture, and a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Miss Olive Stringer, Miss Primrose Gray, Mr. Walter Glynn, and Mr. R. A. Grant. Miss Margaret Baily played a violin solo, and the Rev. E. Capel-Cure a violoncello solo. Mr. Rowland Hughes conducted, Miss Nannie Harding being responsible for the accompaniments.

BUILTH WELLS.—The Philharmonic Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. A. P. Morgan, performed the 'Messiah' on Wednesday evening, April 23. The Society has been in existence some years, but this is generally admitted to be their most successful achievement. The principals were Miss Jennie Ellis, Miss Eria Gwyn, Mr. Dan Jones, and Mr. David Hughes. There was an efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Walter Whitaker.

CAPE TOWN.—The completion of twenty-five years of good work by Dr. T. Barrow Dowling as organist and choirmaster at St. George's Cathedral, was signalled on April 12 by a complimentary banquet, at which a handsomely bound copy of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' was presented to him.

CHIPPENHAM (WILTS.).—The Choral Society gave Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' on April 23 at St. Paul's Church, in the presence of a thousand listeners. Mr. W. R. Pullen conducted, and the solo parts were taken by Miss C. Bush and Mr. Sydney Coltham. Mr. G. H. Freeth was at the organ.

CINDERFORD.—A highly creditable performance of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' was given by the Cinderford and District Choral Society, recently, as part of an interesting miscellaneous concert. The band and choir, under Mr. George Krear's direction, numbered 100 performers. The tenor soloist was Mr. Albert Watson, and both he and Miss Dorothy Dawe contributed songs. The performance of German's 'Beauteous morn,' given by the Cinderford Ladies' Prize Choir, and of Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to Music' by the Society, added to the interest of the occasion.

CORSHAM (WILTS.).—The Chippenham Amateur Orchestra gave their annual concert in the Town Hall on April 30. The programme included a 'Pomp and Circumstance' March by Elgar, Sibelius's 'Valse Triste,' Luigini's 'Ballet Egyptienne,' and Hungarian Dances by Brahms. Mr. W. R. Pullen conducted.

CROWBOROUGH.—'Elijah' was performed in good style by the Crowborough and Jarvis Brook Musical Society on April 29, under the direction of Herr E. Grimm. The soloists were Miss Florence Fleming, Miss May Peters, Mr. J. A. Kellet, and Mr. R. E. Miles.

GREAT YARMOUTH.—At a recent concert of the Musical Society, Elgar's 'Caractacus' was performed with excellent effect under the direction of Mr. Haydon Hare. The romance and dramatic meaning of the music were well realised, and choral technique was of a good order. The solo parts were taken by Miss Dorothy Silk, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Charles Knowles, and Mr. Joseph Ireland.

GUILDFORD.—A successful performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' was given by the Guildford Choral Society on May 7. The soloists were Miss Maude Wilby, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Julien Henry. The leader of the orchestra was Mr. H. Wynn-Reeves, and the conductor Mr. Archibald Hollier.

HANLEY.—In honour of the Royal visit to the Potteries a concert was given by the North Staffordshire Symphony Orchestra at the Victoria Hall on April 22. Under Mr. John Cope's direction the Orchestra gave attractive performances of Brahms's 'Academic Festival' overture, Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, Weber's 'Oberon' overture, a movement from Beethoven's 'Emperor' Pianoforte concerto (with Miss Eileen Cheate as soloist), and movements from Mendelssohn's Violin concerto (with Miss E. M. Caddick as soloist).

HOBART (TASMANIA).—The Orpheus Club have to be congratulated upon the success of their concert given in the Town Hall, on Monday evening, March 31, under the conductorship of Mr. P. Planché-Plummer. The programme included eight part-songs given by the choir, and solos provided by Mr. Percy Marchant and Mr. C. Stanway (vocalists), and Miss Mary Cowan (pianist).

JOHANNESBURG.—A vocal recital was given at the Carlton Hotel by Madame Ethel Le Marchant on April 3. The programme, which was a comprehensive one, contained works by Max Bruch, Gounod, Wolf, Meyerbeer, Schubert, Schumann, and Rubinstein. Madame Santanesa Wedlake (harpist) and Mr. Percy Eastman also contributed to the programme. There was a large audience.—A highly creditable performance, by Mr. R. B. Lloyd, of Beethoven's 'Emperor' Pianoforte concerto was the outstanding feature of the concert given by the Musical Society on March 12. Other numbers in an interesting programme were Walford-Davies's 'Solemn melody,' German's 'Henry VIII. dances,' and songs contributed by Miss Blodwen Hopkins. Mr. F. W. Peters conducted, and secured excellent results from the orchestra.

LEAMINGTON.—A successful concert was given under the direction of Mr. E. Roberts-West by the Leamington Madrigal Society on April 30, with a programme that was made seasonable by the inclusion of Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen.' The choral singing was expressive and effective, and great popularity was earned by the soloists, Miss Edith Kirkwood, Miss Marjorie Lees, Mr. Jesse Hackett, and Mr. James Coleman. The proceedings included a miscellaneous musical programme and a may-pole dance prettily executed by girls from the Municipal Day School.

LEICESTER.—The Kibworth and District Choral Society gave a performance of 'Elijah' at the Village Hall on April 24. The choral singing under Mr. Richard Iliffe's direction had considerable merit, and creditable work was done by the soloists, Miss Jessie Imlay, Mrs. Richard Iliffe, Mr. J. H. Bouns, Mr. C. H. Iliffe, and Mr. A. J. Freeland.—The annual invitation concert of the Leicester Orchestral Union took place with exceptional success at the Temperance Hall on April 24. An excellent programme included Schumann's first Symphony, Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite, Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, and Sinigaglia's 'Piedmontese Dances.' Mr. B. H. Burrows, the conductor, elicited good results from the proficient orchestra. The soloists of the occasion were Miss Rose Feilmann (vocalist) and Miss Grace Burrows (violinist).

LUDLOW.—The Choral Society closed their fifty-fifth season on May 8 with a performance of Parry's 'Pied Piper of Hamelin,' under the conductorship of Mr. H. C. L. Stocks. The programme included Lee Williams's 'Twilight,' and German's 'Nell Gwyn' Dances (played by the Ludlow Orchestral Society). The vocalists were the Hon. Mrs. Eustace Hamilton-Russell, Mr. G. H. Perrins, and Mr. W. R. Batey. The orchestra was led by Mr. J. W. Austin.

MAIDSTONE.—The Orchestral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. F. Cole, gave an exceptionally good concert on April 28, in the Corn Exchange. Making all allowance for professional help, the work reached a very high level for an amateur Society. The programme included the March and Chorus from 'Tannhäuser,' the 'Egmont' Overture, Elgar's two pieces 'Dream children,' Mendelssohn's Pianoforte concerto in G minor (with Mrs. Stansfeld Prior as soloist), a Romance for strings by F. Gilbert Lamb, performed for the first time, and Sibelius's 'Finlandia,' Bizet's Suite (No. 1) 'L'Arlésienne,' Berlioz's 'Marche Hongroise,' and songs contributed by Miss Gilderoy Scott. Mr. Lamb's first effort at orchestral work has quiet melodic charm and superfluous length. Mr. Cole conducted ably.

NORTHAMPTON.—A Coleridge-Taylor night was given by the Musical Society on May 8, the programme consisting of his two most popular choral works, 'A tale of Old Japan' and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast.' In both cases the choir sang with spirit and appropriate expression, and much credit was done to the training received at the hands of Mr. C. J. King, the conductor. The solo parts were taken by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. George Parker.

OSKEHAMPTON.—The annual concert of the Choral Society was given on April 23, and was a distinct advance on any previous performance, both from an artistic and financial point of view. Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm and Stanford's 'Revenge' were given, the solos in the former work being admirably sung by Miss Maud Tellam. Mr. Sydenham Jones conducted, and the accompaniments were supplied by a string orchestra. Songs by Miss Tellam, violoncello solos by Mr. G. C. Pike, and a part-song, completed an attractive programme. Miss Olive Beard was an efficient accompanist.

READING.—At the jubilee concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place on April 23, an admirable performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' was given under the direction of Mr. Osmond Daughtry. The choir not only executed the difficult music with confidence, but produced the right atmosphere and expressive meaning. The solo music was well interpreted by Miss Maria Yelland, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. George Parker.

ST. JOHN'S (NEWFOUNDLAND).—Three performances of 'The Messiah' have recently been given by the Bach Choir, the last taking place on May 6. Large audiences attended, and the standard of the singing was high. Mr. A. H. Allen conducted.

STOURPORT.—Hegar's 'The Wandering Jew' was performed for the first time in England on April 23, by the Stourport Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. George Jackson. The melodiousness and high seriousness of the work made a deep impression. It has many difficulties, which, however, the choir overcame admirably. The programme also included 'Hiawatha's Departure,' which was performed with spirit. The solo parts were taken by Miss May Eaves, Mr. Ernest Howell, and Mr. James Coleman.

TONBRIDGE.—The twenty-sixth concert of the Tonbridge Choral Society took place in the Big School (kindly lent by the Headmaster) on April 30, when a most impressive performance of Brahms's 'German Requiem' was given, under the conductorship of Mr. George J. Kimmins. Miss Winifred Trusler (of Tonbridge), and Mr. Montague Borwell were the soloists. Mr. H. C. Stewart presided at the organ, and a small orchestra of strings, horns, and trumpets provided the accompaniments. There was a large and most appreciative audience. A short miscellaneous selection, which included Mendelssohn's 'Judge me, O God' and Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody,' preceded the principal work.

TORONTO.—The return of Dr. A. S. Vogt, conductor of the Mendelssohn Choir, from his 'Wanderjahr' was celebrated by two semi-public dinners, given at the National Club and the Arts and Letters Club. It is hoped that the Mendelssohn Choir will be able to visit England in 1915, and to aid their purpose it is proposed to raise a guarantee fund of $75,000.

TORRINGTON.—An effective performance of Elgar's 'The banner of St. George' was the chief feature of a successful concert given by the Choral Society on April 23, under the direction of Mr. F. J. Webber. The soprano soloist was Madame Katharine Gerish, and in the miscellaneous programme which followed, solo contributions were made by Mr. J. M. Northcote, Mr. H. G. McWhinnie (flautist), and Miss E. Meredith (violinist).

TYWARDREATH.—On April 17, a successful concert was given by the Choral Society under the direction of Mr. Brennan Smith. Attractive performances were given of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and the 'Death of Minnehaha,' and solo numbers were contributed by Miss Minnie Searle, Mr. Will Foster, Mr. Sydney Smith (vocalists) and Mr. C. G. Pike (violinist).

WATFORD.—At the School of Music a lecture was given on April 9, on 'Brahms and his songs,' by Mr. A. C. Chapell-Harverson. Illustrations were given by Mr. Lionel Carr. The first two movements of Beethoven's fifth Symphony were played by Mr. Victor Duane's orchestra at the Public Library on April 30. The programme also included Mackenzie's Benedictus, Mr. Duane's 'The golden candlesticks,' and some solo numbers.

WELLINGBOROUGH.—An excellent concert, with a performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' as its central feature, was given by All Saints' Choral Society on April 24. The good training received at the hands of the Rev. W. E. Terry was shown in the tone and expression of the choral singing. The solo parts were taken by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. Frank Webster, and the Rev. Richard Spurrell. In the miscellaneous section of the concert the choir was heard in Elgar's 'My love dwelt in a Northern land,' and 'Britons, alert!'

WINCHESTER.—The Test Valley Musical Society came to Winchester on May 6, and gave an excellent concert, at which Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah,' and Beethoven's seventh Symphony were the chief features of the programme. Under Mr. E. H. Moberly's direction, expressive and effective performances were given, especially of the work of Stanford, in which Mr. Charles Tree was the solo vocalist. The concert was highly successful, and considerably raised the prestige of the Society.

WOKING.—The ambitious experiment of performing Tchaikovsky's 'Symphonie Pathétique' was recently undertaken with great credit by the orchestra of the Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. Patrick White. The same programme included Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley,' in which the choir of the Society were heard to advantage.

WOODBURN.—Creditable ability was shown by the Woodburn Male-Voice Choir at a concert on April 23, when Stanford's 'To His flocks,' and Pinsuti's 'Good-night, beloved,' were the principal choral numbers in the programme. Mr. E. J. Hazell conducted.

WOKINGHAM.—Alfred R. Gaul's 'The Holy City' was effectively performed by the Philharmonic Society on April 28, under the direction of Mr. G. V. Durbidge, with Miss Nellie Stevens, Miss Ethel Stevens, Mr. Willie Martin, and Mr. Harry Collier as principals. Each of these artists contributed to the miscellaneous part of the programme, in which Miss Marjorie Choules (violinist) and Miss Dorothy Choules (violinist) were also heard.

Miscellaneous.

Dr. Charles Maclean gave a lecture-recital on 'Rubinstein as pianoforte-composer,' before the Musical Association, at Broadwoods' Rooms, on the afternoon of May 20. Rubinstein, he said, was half Slav and half Jew. Original unimitative creative power in deviation from the norm was the sole final test of eminence in musical composition; and from this point of view Rubinstein was the greatest musical genius which Russia had yet produced. Remarks that his music was an emanation from Mendelssohnianism were absurd and untrue. The Leipzig School was founded on the Volkslied, with mannerisms such as the quick presentation of the dominant. Slav folk-song, if any, underlay Rubinstein. The instinctive phrase of the Leipzig School was a very short one, that of Vienna longer, and that of Rubinstein longer still. Rubinstein was a born melodist. The works played in illustration were: A 'Song without words,' and Rubinstein, Op. 26, i. (contrasted as to form); a chorus each from 'Elijah' and 'Paradise Lost' (contrasted as to phrase-length); Nocturne from Op. 28; 'Enjouement,' from Op. 51; and two movements from Sonatas Opp. 20 and 41 (regarding complete independence from Chopin and Liszt); 'Contredanse,' from Op. 14 (as the most gifted 'quadrille' ever written).

H.R.H. The Duke of Connaught paid a visit of inspection on May 19 to the new building of the Royal Academy of Music, of which Institution he is president, and which was formally opened last year by Prince Arthur in his father's absence in Canada.

We are informed that Herr Eugen d'Albert has decided to give, during the autumn, a concert of Mr. Cyril Scott's works, under the auspices of the Tonkünstlerverein, Vienna, of which Herr d'Albert is president.

Mr. Harry Evans, conductor of the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, has been appointed Director of Music at the University College of North Wales, and musical instructor to the students in training.

Mr. W. A. Morgan, who is widely known, and is one of the promoters of the Cardiff Musical Festival, has taken over the control of Messrs. Vert's concert-agency.

Mr. Raymond Roze announces an autumn season of opera in English at Covent Garden, commencing on November 1, during which he will produce his work 'Joan of Arc.'

Mr. C. T. Bishenden commenced on May 15 a new series of lectures, delivered at 105, New Oxford Street, on 'Victorian composers and singers.'

Mr. John Mundy has joined the Henkel Pianoforte Quartet as violoncellist in the place of Mr. Darbyshire Jones.

Answers to Correspondents.

DICKIE, N.B.—You will probably find what you require in the following list of works, all of which are obtainable from Messrs. Novello: 'Rebekah' (Barnby), 'Emmaus' (Brewer), 'Bethlehem,' 'Olivet to Calvary,' and 'Song of Thanksgiving' (Mauder), 'Lauda Sion' (Mendelssohn), 'The darkest hour' (Moore), 'The daughter of Jairus' (Stainer), 'Seed-time and harvest,' and 'The story of Bethlehem' (West).

TAUNTON.—It is incorrect for a pianist under the age of twelve (and equally so for a pianist over the age of twelve) to use the pedal where it is not marked in the music. Pianists of all ages and standards find in the pedal a useful cloak for faulty technique; but the hiding of faults does not correct them.

R. M., PARIS.—Particulars of the Leeds Festival are to be found in our April issue (p. 231) and, more briefly, in the advertisement columns of the present issue.

CALEB.—We cannot trace either of the chants you send us.

K.—It is of course impossible to answer such a question in print.

FOR DIVINE SERVICE

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED THE PSALTER NOTED

TO GREGORIAN TONES

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plain-song and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plain-song, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter: and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plain-song. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plain-song during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY

JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—X.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

Price Two Shillings.

Paper Boards, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

SHORT PRELUDES

THE FIRST PRINCIPLES

Being an extract from the Author's "THE ACT OF TOUCH."

Designed for School use, and with two new chapters:

DIRECTIONS FOR — AND — LEARNERS, — AND — TEACHERS.

"Every page has its deep, pregnant idea expressed in carefully chosen language. The influence of this extraordinary book should be deep and widespread."—Musical Times.

"It is a book no pianist—whether artist, teacher, or amateur—can afford to be without."—Musical Herald.

"Full of meat" from beginning to end."—Musical News.

NEW EDITION (1912).

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS

CONTAINING

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

COMPOSED BY

J. A. O'NEILL.

IN TWO BOOKS:

. Price Two Shillings each.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, &c. cetera.

THE ASSOCIATION OF MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

We remind our readers that the Annual Conference will be held at Leeds (University Hall) on Friday and Saturday, June 27 and 28. We gave the programme of papers to be read, &c., in full in our last number. The Conference will begin June 27 at 11 a.m., and continue until 4.30 p.m. On June 28 the meeting will begin at 10 a.m., and go on until about 1 p.m.

At 3 p.m. there is to be a rehearsal of the Leeds Festival Choir, under Sir Edward Elgar, admission to which (by ticket) will be afforded to members attending the Conference.

For all further particulars, application should be made to Mrs. Argles, Eversley, Milnthorpe, Westmorland, who is honorary secretary to the Conference.

We deeply regret to have to record the death on May 5 of Miss Mary Egerton, the co-honorary secretary of the Association. An obituary notice appears in the Musical Times and the School Music Review.

At the opening meeting of the Aberdeen Festival on May 21, Lord Aberdeen announced that he had received the following letter from Buckingham Palace: 'The King is graciously pleased to consent to become the patron of the North-East of Scotland Fifth Musical Festival.' This statement was received with great enthusiasm. Aberdeen is indeed exceptionally honoured. Professor Terry, the originator and chief stay of the Festival is, we regret to say, too unwell to take any part in its operations this year. Let us hope that the recognition of his efforts by His Majesty will help to restore him to health quickly. We shall report the Festival in our next issue. A portrait of Professor Terry, and a sketch of his interesting career, appear in the Musical Times this month.

MORECAMBE.—April 29, 30; May 1, 2, 3.

A Festival at Morecambe irresistibly awakens memories of former gatherings at this Lancashire seaside resort. Those of us who have been long associated with the event, and are proud of the record, cannot but see Gorton and Howson reincarnated as it were in all its doings. To-day, when the Festival movement has made such strides as an exponent of all the best cappella music by the old and the most modern masters, the work of these two men who dreamed dreams and realised them is not sufficiently recognised. At the right moment they broke through shackling conditions and boldly forged new paths, and practically created the particular type of competitive Festival which is now followed at the greatest events held in this country.

Did the 1913 programme realise the ideals of the Morecambe founders? Perhaps not very thoroughly, but all the same it was full of good things. It is obviously no easy task to choose sixty or more pieces that will be the right thing for the numerous grades of competitors, from the infant school to the finest choirs in the land. Their possibilities must be considered. As for some critics, it would pass the wit of man and give great trouble to the Angel Gabriel to meet their various exiguous tastes. Four works were specially composed for this year's Festival. These were a long male-voice part-song, 'Dominus illuminatio mea,' by Dr. Walford Davies; 'Music when soft voices die,' by Granville Bantock; 'Spring,' an eight-part chorus by Dr. Hathaway; and a children's cantata, 'The mouse and the lion,' by Alfred Hollins.

The concerts included the children's cantata named above, the 'Bon-Bon' choral suite by Coleridge-Taylor, and most notably the movement 'All flesh is grass,' from the German 'Requiem' of Brahms, which was given in memory of the late Canon Gorton. Other outstanding features were a church choir Festival in which six choirs took part and which was conducted by Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson (organist of Manchester Cathedral), and a free church Festival in which nine choirs took part and which Mr. Harry Evans conducted.

'The mouse and the lion' was sung from memory by about 500 children and went very well indeed, the composer accompanying. Dr. McNaught conducted.

At the miscellaneous concert, at which there were competitions for fishermen's choirs that were exceedingly interesting because of the unexpected refinement of the singing, Miss Ethel M. Kemish gave a vocal recital, and the combined choirs performed very finely Max Bruch's 'On Jordan's banks,' conducted by Mr. Harry Evans.

The most important concert was that referred to above, at which the 'Bon-Bon' suite and the 'Requiem' selection were given. The choir was formed from four local bodies and the Nelson Orchestra, and was conducted by Mr. Harry Evans with conspicuous ability. In the choral suite Mr. Charles Tree was engaged as the soloist, but owing to sudden indisposition he was compelled to withdraw during the performance and Mr. Evans sang the part until a pause allowed another singer to come forward. The 'Requiem' had a very impressive performance, the audience standing throughout. It was a touching tribute to the memory of Canon Gorton, and all the more pathetic because it was submitted not by outsiders, but by those who knew him well.

The following eloquent appreciation by Mr. John Hatch, the present President, appeared in the programme:

'Since last I addressed you Charles Vincent Gorton has passed away. Not again will his inspiring enthusiasm hearten us to our task; not again his cheery welcome encourage to success, his open-hearted sympathy make failure seem almost a reward. But the spirit of his views and his ideals remains with us. Evermore must it be the motive power of our efforts to maintain worthily that high heritage of noble achievement, with which to enrich us he gave the finest of his intellect, the tenderest emotions of his heart. Gorton! Howson! Together, they started this great Festival movement. Together they brought it to a fulness undreamt of in the beginning. Together, now—and we? We who are left! We have set up a memorial that shall keep their names for ever in men's eyes. With music of solemn Requiem we strain across the gulf impassable if only we may bring to them our message of reverence and love, and our assurance we are greatly striving to carry forward, ever forward, the banner they unfurled.'

SOLO SINGING.

Miss Alice M. Guest (soprano), Miss May Ride (contralto), Mr. Sam Bromley (tenor), Mr. Walter Mason (baritone), Mr. Thomas Haworth (bass).

The adjudicators were: Dr. McNaught, Dr. H. Walford Davies, Mr. Harry Evans, Mr. S. H. Nicholson, Mus.B., Dr. J. W. G. Hathaway, Mr. C. H. Fogg, Mr. Charles Tree, and Mr. W. Granger.

The School Choir results are recorded in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

MIDLAND FESTIVAL, BIRMINGHAM.

May 17, 20 to 24.

This Festival has now assumed gigantic proportions. In occupying six days and drawing about 7,000 competitors (the numbers reckoned by entries were nearer 8,000, but there were double entries in some cases) it has made a record in this country.

The great Town Hall, the small theatre, the large theatre, concert room and another room of the Midland Institute, and the Temperance Hall, were kept going to the embarrassment of the audiences and especially of the critics who desired to be in at least two places at once.

The adjudicators were:—Dr. W. G. McNaught, Mr. Harry Evans, Dr. R. R. Terry, Dr. Henry Coward, Dr. W. H. Harris, Dr. H. Walford Davies, Mr. Dan Godfrey, Dr. D. Vaughan Thomas, Mr. George H. Mercer, and Lieut. J. Ord Hume (brass band contests).

It is hopeless for us to give more than a summary of the doings at this colossal event. The programme-book—a wonderful production, consisting of 128 large and closely-printed pages—gives a full list of competitors, the tests with annotations, and the words of all the vocal music used at the competitions and the concerts, and it was sold at sixpence! One hundred and ten pieces are enumerated, and about 170 choirs are listed.

Every evening there were concerts combined with the competitions. On the children's day the chief feature of the programme was the cantata, 'The Luck of Edenhall' (Sydney H. Nicholson), which was performed under Dr. McNaught's direction with much success, the 600 children having memorised the music. The most important work undertaken at the concerts was a performance of Bach's great 'Magnificat.' All the solos, the duets, the trios, and the choruses had been the subject of competition during two days, and the most competent performers were combined with the Birmingham and Midland Institute School of Music Students' Orchestra for the performance. It had been arranged that the conductor of the choir that stood first should conduct the performance of the whole work. This without a rehearsal of the band, the soloists, and the combined choirs! In the end this course was abandoned, and Mr. Harry Evans, who is becoming a regular emergency man (see his appearance at Morecambe as a baritone soloist) came to the rescue. Of course he secured in his masterful way a satisfactory performance.

The strongest feature of the competitive scheme is the class for prize choirs—that is, choirs that have won prizes at other Festivals in the country. These were divided into female-voice, mixed-voice, and male-voice, and many of the finest choirs to be heard in this country responded.

Mrs. Bourne and her Barrow Choir earned the greatest distinction; and Mr. Whittaker's Blackpool Choir, as well as Mr. Aldous's Lancaster Choir, gave performances of scarcely less high merit. Portsmouth, under Mr. W. E. Green, gave a remarkable virtuoso interpretation of Bantock's 'Leprehaun,' a part-song which is as extraordinarily effective as it is technically difficult. Nelson in the male-voice choir section displayed thrilling dramatic power in Hegar's 'Phantom Host,' and the singing of 'Ophelia' (Berlioz) in the female-voice choir section was as beautiful as one could desire.

Three full orchestras and four string orchestras competed. The Slaithwaite Philharmonic Society (Mr. Arthur Armitage) were first in the former class, the test being the whole of the E minor Symphony (Schubert), and the Moseley Musical Club String Orchestra (Mr. T. Henry Smith) were first in their class, the tests being the Larghetto and Finale of Dvorák's Serenade in E.

The solo-singing competitions brought forward some exceptionally fine singing, more especially in the soprano and baritone classes. No one who heard it is likely to forget the singing of Miss M. Barlow (Altrincham) in 'My heart, ever faithful,' and the extraordinarily beautiful song, 'Was it a dream?' (Sibelius); or that of Miss K. Davies (Birmingham) in 'The young nun' (Schubert), or that of Mr. Herbert Simmonds (Harborne) in Purcell's 'Ye twice ten hundred deities,' and 'Wie bist du meine Königin' ('Thou art my queen') by Brahms.

Another remarkable class was that for advanced pianists, in which the test was Liszt's Concert Study in D flat. Fifty-eight candidates from various parts of the country competed. A preliminary trial sorted the number down to six, and finally the first place was accorded to Richard Gourley, a blind boy from Acock's Green, and the second place to Miss V. Assinder, of Moseley. In another pianoforte class, sixty-six candidates played Korngold's 'Wichtelmännlein,' Miss G. D. Dampier, of Birmingham, winning the first place.

Below we give most of the choral results. Some features of the Festival and details of the performances in the chief sections must be left for comment on another occasion. But a grateful tribute should be paid at once to Messrs. Bowker and Stevens, the honorary secretaries, upon whom fell the tremendous burden of organizing this event. The business arrangements of the Festival were a miracle of foresight and industry.

April 11, 19.

This very enjoyable gathering was established some years ago by Lady Lilford. Her ladyship continues to give much time and attention to its development. The Festival is held in the great hall of the famous Oundle School, which provides ample accommodation. One day was devoted entirely to the juniors, who were classified into ten sections. Eleven schools, mostly from the surrounding villages, sent in competitors. Some of the school-choir singing reached a very high standard. Among the best were Warmington, in Colin Taylor's beautiful unison-song 'Robin Redbreast' and Bantock's dainty two-part song 'The Fly,' Raunds (Wesleyan) in Rutland Boughton's two-part song, 'The Piper's song,' and Thrapston Church School in Parry's 'Land to the leeward.' The tone-quality, intonation, precision, enunciation, and artistic finish of these performances were equal to those of the highest grade heard at the large competitions. It was evident that the teachers concerned have exceptional skill.

On the senior-choir day fifteen places were represented, some competitors coming from Peterborough and others from Kettering. Polebrook gave excellent performances of German's 'Sleeping' (a very charming part-song in the composer's most melodious style) and Macfarren's 'She stole my love.' Raunds (Wesleyan) Choir showed really first-rate training in Coleridge-Taylor's dramatic part-song 'The lee shore,' and Kettering Gleemen, Oundle (Avondale), and Ringstead Adult School in Bantock's 'Festival song' showed excellent voice and skilled training; they came out of the competition in the order named. A feature of this Festival is the concert performance of the combined choirs, assisted by well-known professional artists. On this occasion the choirs sang a chorus from 'Samson' and another from 'Elijah,' and Mr. Campbell MacInnes rejoiced the audience with his folk-song singing, Miss Fifine de la Cote exhibited her brilliant powers of execution, and Miss Marjorie Haywood (violinist) her fine technique and powers of interpretation. The audience was an overflowing one. Lady Lilford and the active members of the committee are to be congratulated upon having organized this satisfactory event.

GRANTHAM AND DISTRICT.—April 28, 29.

This Festival was commenced last year, and this year's event bore witness to the educational result of the first gathering, in increased entries and, what is even more satisfactory, in a higher general average of performances. Thirteen places, including Grantham, sent in competitors on the junior day. Denton gave such a delightfully-contrived performance of an action-song, 'A soldier's life' (Stainer) that I felt they must have full marks. St. Sebastian (Great Gonerby) was almost as good. It was surprising to hear 'Where go the boats' and 'My bed is a boat,' two very artistic unison-songs by R. H. Macdonald to words by R. L. Stevenson, sung with an appealing beauty of tone and expression by two village schools, Somerby and Syston. All honour to the school teachers who in remote corners of the country can produce such beautiful results! Ancaster was another good school, and the Grantham Girls' Upper School and Spittlegate Girls' School were equally successful in giving almost perfect performances of Stanford's 'Laughing' song (two parts); this school also did very well in the sight-singing. At a children's concert, Rathbone's 'Vogelwied' was very well performed by 450 children, Dr. Radcliffe conducting. This capable local professor's attitude to the festival work is a shining example to many who shrink from submitting their work to comparison or outside criticism. He brings choirs into this and that class regardless of whether they are to be 'winners,' and only because of the educational advantages they may derive. Does his reputation suffer because he does not always come out at the top? Surely not! He gains in respect and regard.

Miss Susan Lushington played violin solos in her alluring style, and Mr. George Parker sang songs to the great satisfaction of the large audience assembled in the Drill Hall.

On the second day twenty-one choirs entered in the ten classes enumerated in the syllabus. There were no results of outstanding merit, but the general average was satisfactory. The material of the choirs is good. There is need for closer study of the finer points of choral technique, more attention to phrasing and correct rhythmic treatment (which is generally supposed to take care of itself) and more penetration into the significance of the words and the composers' treatment.

Ropsley, Colsterworth, Caythorpe (Choral Society and the Church Choir), the Grantham Male-Voice Choir, and Hough were in the first rank. The winning choirs sang at an evening concert, and combined to sing one or two choruses under Dr. Radcliffe. The choir consisted of about 500 voices. There was throughout the proceedings an atmosphere of social pleasantness and good-will amongst competitors that made the event a happy one and an augury of its future success. The president of the committee is Lady Maria Welby, who takes an active interest in the work, and the hard-worked and urbane secretary is Major J. C. Burnett.

SANDY (BEDFORDSHIRE).—May 8.

This countryside Festival usefully stimulates the neighbourhood. There were six classes for solo-singing, a junior pianoforte class, three for vocal quartets, one for choirs, and three for recitations. There were fifty-nine entries. Kempston Musical Society (Mr. A. F. Parris) gave a very expressive performance of Stainer's 'O bountiful Jesu.' The solo-singing and playing reached a creditable standard, and all concerned seemed willing to listen to criticism.

AYRSHIRE FESTIVAL, KILMARNOCK.

Although only in its second year, this Festival was an astonishing success. Last year it was held at Ayr, and it is evident that on that occasion much musical zeal was stimulated which found vent at Kilmarnock. On this occasion there were over 2,000 competitors, whereas at Ayr there were about 850. The gathering at Kilmarnock was held in the Agricultural Hall, a building more commodious than it is handsome, but fitted with an ample orchestral platform, and generally smartened by bunting, it admirably served the purpose. On the second day it was filled to its utmost capacity. The condition of affairs during the evening was well-expressed by a local journalist, who said that the atmosphere was so hot that 'instead of a group of singing-birds, they all might be likened to a pie of stewed larks.' I do not think I have ever before witnessed more interest in competitive proceedings on the part of the audience than was shown on this enjoyable occasion. Choirs and executants generally in Scotland are rather more than usually sensitive to criticism, which must be justified to the hilt before it is accepted, and in turn they are apt to criticise adjudicators, and thus it may be hoped educate them to the very high standard demanded. This is as it should be, for it is only by free criticism of all the ways and means of competitions that the movement can stimulate all concerned. But of course there is no room for ill-will, or the exercise of any of the non-Christian virtues. A feature of much interest, because of its great potentialities, was the Industrial Choir section, in which there were nine entries.

Good musical capacity was shown in this department. That it needed more cultivation and polish was obvious, and no doubt the experiences of the Festival will induce the choirs to work in this direction. As it was, it seemed clear that they enjoyed their musical outing. The journalist already quoted relates the following incident: "'Weel, Jenny, are ye in guid singin' form the nicht?' " 'Man,' said the damsel seriously, "I was that nervous when I wis up on that platform that I didna ken doh frae soh." "Toots, lassie," responded the questioner, "the referee was never ken the difference. He'll be for tellin' ye that ye sing like a lintie." So much for adjudicators!

In the church choirs there was some refined singing, notably by the Grange U.F. Church Choir; Kilmarnock (Mr. Edgar Bottomley) and the High Parish Kirk, Kilmarnock. The highest point was touched by the Ayr Burgh and County Choir (Mr. Frederic Ely) and the Kilmarnock Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. G. A. Jones). Each in turn was a winner in the two chief choral classes. Only the best equipped and led choirs in the country could hope to give adequate interpretations of such pieces as 'Deep in my soul' (Elgar) and 'On Himalay' (Bantock). Both these part-songs were interpreted by Mr. Ely's choir as well as I have heard them performed by the best choirs in England.

The Festival has the advantage of the support of Sir William Houldsworth, Bart., and of the active co-operation of his daughter, Mrs. Savile. Another asset in the Kilmarnock event was Mr. Robert D. Wood, who brought much organizing ability to bear on the multifarious details of the Festival.

VOLUNTARY CHURCH CHOIRS (AYRSHIRE).

Places under 5,000 inhabitants.

1st. West Church, Cunnock (Mr. J. D. M. Hodge).

Places over 5,000 inhabitants.

1st. Grange U.F. Church, Kilmarnock (Mr. E. Bottomley).

CHURCH CHOIRS (Open Class).

1st. High Parish Kirk, Kilmarnock (Mr. J. Reid Higbet).

SCHOOL CHOIRS.

Six classes, in which the following were the prize winners:

The Academy, Beith (Miss L. C. Gillies).
Hamilton Public School (Miss J. M. Lorimer), (two classes).

Ayr Academy, Class B (Mr. Frederic Ely).
Kilmarnock Academy (Mr. E. Bottomley).

CHORAL SOCIETIES (Open Class).

Tests: 'Death, I do not fear thee' (Bach).

'Deep in my soul' (Elgar).

'On Himalay' (Bantock).

1st. Ayr Burgh and County Choir (Mr. Frederic Ely).

HEREFORD.—(Whit Monday) May 12.

This was an experiment on a rather large scale. The appeal was made to a wide area, the promoters having faith that they could attract Welsh choirs as well as the numerous small musical organizations in the immediate district. There were 20 entries in the various choral classes, and over 100 in the instrumental and vocal solo classes. The Shire Hall was a busy scene all day. Notwithstanding most inclement weather, there was a large attendance of the public. The chief results were as follows:

JUVENILE CHOIRS (Open).

Test: 'The Sabbath bell' (Smart).

1st. Weston-under-Penyard School, near Ross.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Challenge Cup).

Test: 'A wet sheet and a flowing sea' (Lloyd).

1st. Wichia Male-Voice Choir, Droitwich.

2nd. Mynydd Glee Society, Pontypool.

3rd. Hereford Male-Voice Party.

CHIEF CHORAL (60 to 120 voices).—Open Silver Challenge Shield.

Test: 'O great is the depth,' from 'St. Paul' (Mendelssohn).

1st. Abersychan Choir (71).

2nd. Hereford (70).

3rd. Brynmawr (69).

The Mayor of Hereford presided during the daytime, and Dr. Sinclair at the evening session.

RIPLEY (DERBYSHIRE).—May 13.

This event was held in a football ground. It was very fortunate that the day was a fine one. Singing in the open has a special effect; the sound-waves seem to undergo a sifting process which tends in some degree to alter the character of vocal tone. In the juvenile class two two-part songs, 'Robin, sweet robin,' and 'Riding to fairyland,' both by Granville Bantock, were sung without accompaniment by four children's choirs. Milford School (Mr. C. S. Harris) gave excellent performances, and came out first. But the other three choirs were not far behind. Three church or chapel choirs sang with almost equal ability; Huthwaite Primitive Methodist (Mr. S. Paling) being slightly ahead of the others. MacDowell's 'War song' tested men's-voice choirs, and the Alfreton Orpheus Club (Mr. C. Robinson) came out first. Four excellent mixed-voice choirs competed with 'The battle of the Baltic' (Lloyd). Matlock Vocal Society (Mr. L. G. Wildgoose) gave a first-rate performance, and was awarded a silver shield. There was a good attendance of the public during the day.

W. G. McN.

ILKLEY.—April 18, 19.

This Festival, which was partly reported in our May number, occupied three days. The tests in the chief choral class were 'Spring Song,' especially written for the Festival by the late Frank Davidson, and Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees.'

THE BERKHAMSTED AND DISTRICT COMPETITIVE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

This Festival, the first of its kind in the district, was held on April 19, in the hall of the Berkhamsted Grammar School, and comprised a number of competitions for church choirs, choral Societies, elementary schools, and brass bands. The school-children's competitions were by far the best and most encouraging part of the Festival—all the children, even those from small villages, singing intelligently and well. The principal event for the choral Societies was won by the Leighton and Linslade Society, a strong and well-balanced choir. The Aldenham Ladies were successful in the class for ladies' choirs, and the Berkhamsted Male-Voice Choir in the corresponding competition for men. The test-pieces for choirs and choral Societies were not well chosen, except three or four which had been selected by the judges, Dr. R. R. Terry and Mr. Montague Borwell. This fact, and the novelty of the Festival, were no doubt the causes of a paucity of entries in some of the events, but for a first time the Festival was a distinct success.

WILTS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—April 22 and 23.

The third Wilts Musical Competitive Festival took place at Trowbridge on April 22 and 23, and the judges, Dr. Davies, Mr. J. S. Liddle, and Mr. Clive Carey, testified to the great progress made during the short time this Association has existed. There were fifteen classes, five for junior choral competitions, eight for senior, and two instrumental classes, and in all sixty-one entries. These included twenty-three schools and juvenile choirs, and thirteen choral Societies. There were two well-attended and successful concerts. The work sung by the massed choirs of the choral Societies was Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, and on the children's day 600 children gave a spirited performance of 'Drake's Drum' by Coleridge-Taylor.

A feature of the concerts was the amateur orchestra of seventy-eight members, trained and conducted by Mr. Frank Bartlett (of the London Symphony Orchestra). Rehearsals were held at three different centres in the county, the whole orchestra only meeting for combined rehearsal on the day of the Festival. By this means, the Wilts Association are solving the difficulty which besets most Competitive Festival Associations as to how to provide an orchestra which will not cripple the financial resources of the Association. At the same time the orchestra, along with the classes for instrumental trios and quartets, provides ample scope for that branch of musical art which is too often neglected at these Competitive Festivals. In the school classes, following the example set by the Cornish Association last year, a certificate of merit was offered for all choirs obtaining four-fifths of the total marks. Though the school-singing was as a whole a very creditable performance, no school obtained the requisite number of marks for this award.

PEOPLE'S PALACE (EAST LONDON).

April and May.

This elaborate and highly beneficial competition was again held with great success, due largely to the enthusiasm and organizing capacity of the honorary secretary, Miss Edith Barran. There were classes for school and other children's choirs, choirs from continuation schools and places of worship, male-voice choirs, female-voice choirs, and choral Societies. In the last-mentioned section the chief tests and results were as follows:

CHORAL SOCIETIES.

Tests: 'My delight and thy delight' (Parry).
'Come, shepherds, follow me' (Benet).

1st. Toynbee Choral Society (Mr. Geoffrey Garrod).

Over 60 voices.

Tests: 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' (Wilbye).
'My love dwelt in a northern land' (Elgar).

1st. Queen's Road Choir, Dalston (Mr. Walter Penn).
St. Thomas's, Stepney, Musical Society (Rev. C. J. Beresford).

2nd. Mr. G. Day Winter's Select Choir (Mr. G. Day Winter).

At the final concert on May 3 various test-pieces and Bach's cantata 'O Light Everlasting' were sung under Sir Walter Parratt's direction, and the prizes were distributed by H.R.H. Princess Alexander of Teck.

This Festival was again held with great success. Dr. McNaught, Dr. R. R. Terry, Mr. Cecil Sharp, and Dr. Merrick adjudicated, and made their awards as follows in the chief classes:

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS (Open Class).

Test: 'A lake and a fairy boat' (Dunhill).

1st. Bathwick C.E. Boys' School.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

Mixed.

1st. Peasedown St. John's School.

Boys.

Bathwick C.E.

Girls.

Bathwick C.E.

MORRIS-DANCING (Schools).

1st. St. John's, Glastonbury (Girls).

CHORAL SOCIETIES (Villages, under 800).

Six entries.

Test: 'The Knight's tomb' (Stanford).

1st. Nunnery Delamere Choir.

2nd. Doultong Choral Society.

CHORAL SOCIETIES (Open Class).

Test: 'Bring me a golden pen' (Cowen).

1st. Midsomer Norton.

2nd. Shepton Mallet.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Midsummer clouds' (MacDowell).

'I wound my horn' (Brahms).

1st. Wookey Hole.

2nd. Bath Orpheus.

1st. Ashwick Choral Society.

MADRIGAL SINGING (Open).

Test: Flora gave me fairest flowers' (Wilbye).

1st. Midsomer Norton.

MADRIGAL SINGING (Village Choirs).

Six entries.

Test: 'Awake, sweet love' (Dowland).

1st. Nunnery Delamere.

2nd. Chewton Mendip.

Concerts given by the combined choirs were ably conducted by Mr. Clive Carey. On the last evening Barnby's 'Rebekah' was the chief item.

BOLTON (LANCS.)—April 24—26.

Bolton-le-Moors is the latest North-country centre to establish a Festival. In point of size only Birmingham, Morecambe, and Blackpool now surpass it: almost a unique experience for an initial meeting. John Wesley's 'Journal' bears eloquent testimony to the singing power of the Boltonians, and the old chapel in which he preached (now attached to the big Wesleyan Mission Hall) was used by the choirs for assembling purposes prior to coming into the Victoria Hall for the competitions. The Town Hall was also used, and civic proceedings opened and closed the Festival. The judges were Messrs. Bantock, Fogg, Rawdon Briggs, Mark Noble, and Dr. Coward (first day only). On the business and managerial side the first meeting was splendidly organized and, thanks to numerous willing officials, worked with admirable smoothness. Messrs. Haythornthwaite and Vickers were hon. secretaries, and the Mayor (Dr. Young) presided. Chief cause for satisfaction is found in the active participation of the borough schools, the Director of Education (Mr. Fred Wilkinson) being an active member of the executive and most helpful in encouraging timid starters. About half the Council Schools competed, and next year promises to see every school in the place brought under Festival influences. On the last day approximately thirty choirs, drawn from a radius of a dozen miles from Bolton, astonished even the best-informed local people by their numbers and quality, once more revealing the rich veins of unsuspected musical capacity in Lancashire industrialism, only awaiting the life-giving touch of a well-thought out Festival scheme. Not one of them had pretensions to distinction, but all displayed possibilities of great development. Few even were aware of the existence of any choir at all in the village which furnished the winner in the Mixed-Voice Class, yet it was within hearing distance of Bolton Town Hall clock. Good solo-singing was also to be found in this locality, mostly workers in foundry, mill, weaving-shed, or shop. Wisely handled, this Festival can be an immense power for advancement; the musical soil is evidently of great fertility, and will repay the ablest cultivation. It is most gratifying to learn that, despite the extra expense incurred in coping with a Festival much larger than was anticipated, there is a credit balance to carry forward to next year.

1st. Brownlow Fold Council School.

2nd. Markland Hill Council School.

MAYPOLE SONG AND DANCE (under 14).

The principal tests were 'A love symphony' (Percy Pitt) and 'Dim-lit woods' (Brahms) for the mixed-voice choirs, 'Hymn to the Trinity' (Tchaikovsky) for the Church and Chapel Choirs, and 'Soldier, rest' (Oliver King) for the male-voice choirs.

PONTEFRAC T.—April 29, 30, May 3.

Good results attended this comprehensive scheme of competitions, in which there were over 200 entries. The first day was devoted to juvenile classes, in which the chief prizes were carried off by Brotherton C.S., Darrington National School, Normanton Common C.S. and Kelkirk National School. Competitions open to soloists and choirs from villages were held on the second day, the chief choral prizes falling to Wentbridge Ladies' Choir, Cudworth Brotherhood, South Hiendley Wesleyan Choir, Aberford Choral Society, Badsworth Choral Society, and in the principal class, Ferrybridge Choral Society.

The chief tests and results in the open contests, which were heard on the third day, were as follows:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (seven entries).

Test: 'The Cloud' (Fletcher).

1st. Hull Ladies' Musical Union (Miss Eleanor Coward).

2nd. Castleford (Mr. S. Gee).

3rd. Normanton (Rev. C. D. Atkinson).

CHORAL SOCIETIES (five entries).

Tests: 'How sweet the moonlight' (Atkinson).
Extract from 'The Revenge' (Stanford).
'A love symphony' (Pitt).

- 1st. Monk Fryston Choral Society.
2nd. Darrington.
3rd. Normanton.

BUXTON.—May 1, 2, 3.

The three days of musical competition among the amenities of Buxton passed off pleasantly, and with some good musical results. The choral singing in the chief classes often reached a high standard. Perhaps the most memorable event of the Festival was the singing of Coleridge-Taylor's 'She dwells by great Kenhawa's side' by a choir of young girls from Nottingham trained by Mr. William Turner. In the principal mixed-voice class, (Elgar's 'Britons, alert!' and Wilbye's 'Ye that do live in pleasures plenty') eight choirs entered, and the singing was all of good quality. Ryecroft (Mr. Jack Ramsden) and Nottingham Philharmonic (Mr. W. Turner), the first and second prize-winners, showed exceptional insight in the madrigal. Eight male-voice choirs, of whom Alfreton Orpheus Glee Club were the best, sang Blumenthal's 'What care I how fair she be?' In the classes for children's choirs, Harper Hill C.S. (Mr. A. Waterfall), Offerton Industrial School (Mr. G. W. Cleaver), Burton C.S. (Mr. C. Howard), and Hadfield C.S. (Mr. B. Whiteley) won the chief prizes. There were classes for local choirs, choirs from places of worship, quartet parties, solo singers and players, &c. The adjudicators were Dr. A. H. Brewer, Mr. W. McNaught (who conducted a performance by combined children's choirs of his cantata, 'Mice in council'), and Mr. Granville Humphreys.

GLASGOW.—May 2, 3.

This, the third annual Festival, demonstrated emphatically a much increased and more widely-spread interest in the Festival movement, and, with the possible exception of school choirs, a steady advance in artistic achievement in all classes. There was a greater number of entries, and these would have been even more numerous but for the unfortunate action of certain English railway companies who refused to grant the usual facilities to competing choirs from beyond the Border. In consequence, save for a quartet from Carlisle and the Ulster Male Choir from Belfast, the competitors were wholly Scottish, drawn from an area bounded on the north by Aberdeen and on the south by Ayr. Mr. Granville Bantock, the adjudicator-in-chief, who was assisted by Mr. David Stephen, commented on the apparently mediocre singing of the school choirs, but it is only fair to those in charge of school music in Glasgow and neighbourhood to say that the value of the Festival movement is not yet fully realised by the headmasters of the schools (we hope for a change in their outlook before next Festival), and that the schools are capable of producing choirs approaching at least the English Festival standard. A unique entry in the school class was a choir from Bridgeton School for Defective Children, and their winning a third prize was a very popular award. A surprising victory was that of the Paisley Provident Co-operative Choir over the more mature and experienced singers of the Glasgow Orpheus (Ladies') Choir. But the high-water mark of the Festival performances was reached in the Glasgow Orpheus Choir's performance of Bantock's 'Evening has lost her throne,' which gained 100 per cent. of marks, and which the composer-adjudicator said he could not hope to hear excelled! A special word of praise is due to the Press, especially the Glasgow Herald and the Evening Times, for generous support, and to Mr. F. H. Bisset, Director of Competitions, and Mr. E. H. Hale, the Secretary, whose splendid organization enabled the Festival to run with perfect smoothness. Sir John Stirling-Maxwell, Bart., the President of the Festival, presided at the closing session, and Lady Stirling-Maxwell presented the chief prizes.

The following were the chief awards:

- MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Industrial Class).
1st. Babcock & Wilcox Male-Voice Choir, Renfrew (Mr. C. Rennie).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (Industrial Class).

- Stewart & McDonald's Harmonic Association, Glasgow (Mr. E. Lamont).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Challenge Class).

- Paisley Provident Co-operative Choir (Mr. A. Craig).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Class B).

- 1st. Miss Boyd Steven's Ladies' Choir (Miss Boyd Steven).

CHURCH CHOIRS (Challenge Class).

- 1st. King's College Chapel Choir, Aberdeen (Miss E. Christie).

- 2nd. Westbourne Church Choir, Glasgow (Mr. A. M. Henderson).

PSALMODY TEST.

- Westbourne Church Choir, Glasgow (Mr. A. M. Henderson).

CHURCH CHOIRS (Class B).

- 1st. Middle U.F. Church, Greenock (Mr. F. Smith).

PSALMODY TEST.

- Candlish Memorial U.F. Church, Glasgow (Mr. W. J. Simmons).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Challenge Class).

- 1st. Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. H. S. Robertson).

- 2nd. Ayr Burgh and County Choir (Mr. F. Ely).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (Scottish Challenge Class).

- St. George Co-operative Musical Association (Mr. W. Wilson).

Strathaven Choral Union (Mr. J. H. Baxter).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Challenge Class).

- Ulster Male Choir, Belfast (Mr. S. Holmes).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Scottish Challenge Class).

- 1st. Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. H. S. Robertson).

- 2nd. Babcock & Wilcox Male-Voice Choir, Renfrew (Mr. C. Rennie).

SIGHT-SINGING COMPETITION (Adult).

- 1st. Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. H. S. Robertson).

- 2nd. Westbourne Church Choir, Glasgow (Mr. A. M. Henderson).

OXFORD (THE THREE COUNTIES FESTIVAL).

April 28.

The first-prizes in the principal choral competitions at this Festival were won by the following choirs:

CHILDREN.

- Henley Girls' C.E. School.
Wesleyan Higher Grade School, Oxford.
Princes Risborough C.E. School.
Aston Clinton Boys' School.
Abingdon C.E. School.
Penn C.E. School.
Wallington S.S.
Lang Club.

ADULTS.

- All Saints' Choir (Coleshill).
Beaconsfield Church Choir.
Girls' Fellowship Club, Oxford.
St. Giles's Parish Church Choir.

WHITEY (ESKDALE).—A successful Festival was held on April 15 and 16. There was an increased entry list for the junior section, in which the first prizes were taken by Pickering, Farndale, Hawsker, and Sneaton Guild. Among the senior choral competitions those for choirs from places of worship were the most notable, as they had the largest number of competing choirs—four in each of two classes. The prizes were taken by Thorpe and Saltburn. Other prizes for choral singing were taken by Great Ayton (village choral societies), Whitby Bohemian Male-Voice Choir, Caedmon Ladies' Choir, and, in the chief mixed-voice class, Whitby. The adjudicators were Dr. Bairstow and Mr. T. J. Hoggett.

MR. ANDERSON NICOL

Begs to announce his return from Italy and Germany, where he has been fulfilling Operatic and Concert engagements, following on a ten months' concert tour in Australia. Available for the concert season of 1913-14.

"Be first mentioned Mr. Anderson Nicol. The artist, who last night appeared for the first time in Germany, came, sang, and conquered. The 'Romance of Radames' was heard with wonderful intonation and phrasing. The voice is pure lyric, the high notes dazzling; one will indeed have met with such brilliant material. Strenuous applause followed this artistic feat so that the Romance had to be repeated. With the 'Gral Song' (Lohengrin), Herr Nicol had such a success that it came to frantic ovations, and the artist had to appear innumerable times before the public. We hope soon to have the opportunity to hear Herr Nicol again; perhaps it is possible to hear this Caruso-rival during the coming season on the stage in one of his best parts."—Neuester Anzeiger, Mainz.

"The part of Alfredo had an ideal interpreter in Signor Anderson Nicol, who in addition to being the possessor of a voice of the most beautiful tenor timbre, with brilliant top notes, also displayed splendid histrionic powers."—Il Secolo.

MR. CHARLES TREE.

"ELIJAH." Perth, Dec. 18, 1912.—"Of the soloists Mr. Tree was a giant among dwarfs. To hear him is to wonder that such a wealth of tone can come from the human voice. This was an interpretation equalled only by that of . . . who in his day was the ideal Elijah. All that he did was invested with a musical significance one expects from him."—Constitutional.

VOCAL RECITAL. Glasgow, Oct. 26, 1912.—"After listening to songs by Mozart, Faure, Korby, &c., one was impressed not only with his natural means of expression, but also by the skill with which he used them, and his unerring perception of the true inward meaning of songs widely diverse in mood and style."—Citizen.

Weston, May 10, 1913.—"Perhaps the finest (as he certainly is) the most naturally dramatic baritone of the day; he had an enthusiastic reception, for did he appear here weekly, neither time nor custom could stifle his infinite variety. He sang with all the glorious open tone and consummate gift of expression which have made his fame."—Mercury.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FROM THE ABOVE:

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

The present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

RULE, BRITANNIA

BY

WILLIAM HAYMAN CUMMINGS.

PREFACE.

The glorious National Song, "Rule, Britannia," is familiar to the whole British Race; nevertheless, very few men and women are acquainted with the history of its birth and parentage.

In the following pages I have endeavoured to chronicle all the facts which are discoverable by diligent research, and to present them in an attractive and entertaining manner.

The life of Dr. Arne, the composer of "Rule, Britannia," offers to the reader and to the music student an interesting and instructive story, showing that natural ability, even when combined with genius, is not sufficient to ensure a triumphant and successful career. Morality and conscientious rectitude in the affairs of life are essential, and had Arne exercised these, his exceptional gifts might have enabled him to surpass his great contemporary, Handel.

It only remains to be noted that many letters and documents are here printed for the first time, some of them copied from the original autographs in my possession. They illuminate much which has hitherto been obscure and uncertain in the career of a famous composer.

MOUSSORGSKY'S OPERAS.

By ROSA NEWMARCH.

Seventeen years ago I first became acquainted with Moussorgsky's music. I was then working in Petersburg under the guidance of Vladimir Stassov, the champion of the national movement and director of the Fine Arts section of the Imperial Public Library. Day by day I occupied a place in the room adjoining Stassov's, and the fiery, energetic old man used to stride in every hour or so with some fresh book or score, or some unpublished correspondence which he thought necessary for my education; always impatient for me to complete one task and pass on to another.

Not every one worked comfortably with him, for he set a pace that soon finished off the indolent or physically incapable. The field of Russian art was rapidly expanding, and at that time the workers were few and often merely superficial, consequently the willing labourer must not shirk doing double shifts. Moreover, Stassov, like many Russians, realised the shortness of life and the imminence of death with such intense, painful clearness that it became infectious.

He could, however, restrain his impatience on occasion. The ultimate acknowledgment of Moussorgsky's genius was one of the dearest hopes of his heart; but he did not show me the operas until he thought I was ripe for that honour. Then, together, we went through the early edition of 'Boris Godounov' (1875) and 'Khovanstchina,' already issued with Rimsky-Korsakov's revisions. 'Love them or hate them,' Stassov used to say in my moments of doubtful enthusiasm, 'but at least take the trouble to know every page of them. There is more vitality in Moussorgsky than in any of our contemporary composers. These operas will go further afield than the rest, and you will see their day when I shall no longer be here to follow them to Germany and France, and perhaps (rather doubtfully) to England.' How surely his predictions regarding this and other questions have been fulfilled is borne in upon me every year that I live and work in the world of music. Later on he gave me the new edition of 'Boris' (1896), edited by the composer's life-long friend—and in some degree his teacher—Rimsky-Korsakov. Theoretically, Stassov was furiously opposed to these editorial proceedings; for, while admitting Moussorgsky's technical limitations and his tendency to be slovenly in workmanship, he still believed it was better for the world to see this individual and inspired composer with all his faults ruthlessly exposed to view, than clothed and in his right mind with the assistance of Rimsky-Korsakov. Stassov's attitude to Moussorgsky was that of the Russian vagabond who said to Stephen Graham: 'Love us while we are dirty, for when we are clean all the world will love us.' We who loved Moussorgsky's music in spite of all its apparent disrevelment may feel inclined to resent Rimsky-Korsakov's conscientious grooming of it. But when it actually came to the question of producing the operas, even Stassov, I think, realised the need for some practical revisions, without which Moussorgsky's original scores, with all their potential greatness, ran considerable risk of becoming mere archaeological curiosities. In 1908, Bessel published a later edition of 'Boris,' restoring the scenes cut out of the version of 1896. This is the edition now generally used; the first one, on which I was educated, having become somewhat of a rarity.

I do not propose to turn this article into a comparative analysis of the two scores of 'Boris,' or to contribute anything here to the conflict now being waged in Russia and Paris as to the respective merits of 'Khovanstchina' according to Rimsky-Korsakov, or according to Diaghilev, Ravel, and Stravinsky. At last we have got Russian opera in England, given under the best available conditions; for heaven's sake let the public hear it undisturbed by all needless polemics. We may rest assured that the operas still contain enough of Moussorgsky's essential genius not to fail of their profound psychological impression. With what grim sardonic humour Moussorgsky himself would have watched this controversy, and what a blood-curdling song-parable he may even now be composing, likening the dead genius to a fallen warrior, and the army of commentators and 'improvers' to a flock of crows each bearing away something of his vital organism, and battenning on his musical remains.

Modeste Moussorgsky was born March 16/28, 1839, at Karevo, in the Government of Pskov. He was of good family, but his people were comparatively poor. His father, who died in 1853, gave Modeste every facility for becoming an excellent amateur pianist; his mother grounded him in music, and remained the good genius of the young man's life, until her death early in the 'sixties. Moussorgsky was educated for the army, and entered the famous Preobajensky Guards at eighteen. Borodin has left a graphic sketch, dating from 1856, of a dandified, but attractive, young officer, popular in society, singing agreeably, and endowed with a gift for languages. The account of Moussorgsky's subsequent meeting with Dargomijsky and Mily Balakirev, of his awakening to the consciousness of his artistic powers, and his unhesitating renunciation of all his worldly prospects for music's sake, reads more like a religious than an artistic conversion. In most biographical sketches of Moussorgsky unnecessary stress is laid upon the fact of his having been a drunkard, and addicted to drugs. It is true that towards the end of his life, after he had suffered all the stupidity and cruelty that 'world's use' can inflict upon a man incapable of compromising with his artistic conscience, he took refuge from pain and insomnia in stimulants and narcotics. But neither 'Boris' nor 'Khovanstchina,' nor any of his better lyrics, can be judged as the work of a dipsomaniac. Probably only five or six of his songs, composed as late as 1877, show any trace whatever of mental deterioration.

It was by a happy chance that Moussorgsky became acquainted with Dargomijsky in 1856, since the latter was at that moment the sole mature representative of national music in Russia. Glinka, broken in health and spirit, had just started on a journey abroad from which he was destined never to return; while Balakirev, Cui, Borodin, and the other members of the new school of Russian music, had as yet produced next to nothing. Dargomijsky was still smarting under the comparative failure of his opera 'The Roussalka,' which had been produced in Petersburg a few months previously. Its racy humour and touches of actuality were not to the taste of a public nurtured wholly on Italian music. Dispirited, but undaunted, Dargomijsky, at the time of Moussorgsky's first visit, was engaged upon the work which was to embody the ultimate expression of his artistic creed: 'I want the note to be the direct equivalent of the work. Above all things I want the truth.' The cultured classes of Russia, just awakening to the emotional positivism of Gogol and Dostoievsky, were still far from prepared to welcome an apostle of musical realism. Dargomijsky's operatic experiment, 'The Stone Guest' (based on Poushkin's version of 'Don Juan') made no appeal to the public; and although it was accepted in a moment of enthusiasm as the ideal model of the young Russian school, only Moussorgsky eventually followed his master's theories to their logical conclusion. While intercourse with Dargomijsky contributed to a forced maturing of Moussorgsky's ideas about music, the circumstances of his life still hindered his technical development. His early letters to Cui and Stassov show how deeply and independently he had already thought out certain problems of his art. Meanwhile Balakirev carried on his musical education in a far more effective fashion than has ever been admitted by those who claim that Moussorgsky was wholly self-taught, or, in other words, completely ignorant of his craft. The 'Symphonic Intermezzo,' composed in 1861, shows how insistent and thorough was Balakirev's determination that his pupils should grasp the principles of tradition before setting up as innovators. Here we have a sound piece of workmanship, showing clear traces of Bach's influence; the middle movement, founded on a national air, being very original in its development, but kept strictly within classical form.

Faced with the prospect of service in a country garrison, Moussorgsky left the army in 1859, and accepted a small post in a Government office which soon proved just as irksome as regimental life. I pass over the compositions of the next year or two as having little connection with the broad lines of his subsequent development. In 1866 he fell ill, and rusticated for a couple of years on a remote estate belonging to his brother. During this period of rest he seems to have found himself as a creative artist. After working for a time upon an opera based on Flaubert's novel 'Salammbô,' he turned his attention to song, and between 1864 and his return to Petersburg in 1868, produced a number of his wonderful reflections of Russian life in its pathetic and humorous aspects; a series of human documents which are worthy to live side by side with the works of Gogol, Dostoievsky, and Tolstoy. The analysis of these songs stands outside the scope of this article; but they contain the essence of Moussorgsky's genius.

His next operatic essay took the form which he described as 'opéra-dialogué.' The subject—Gogol's prose comedy 'The match-maker'—was admirably suited to him, but after completing the first Act he abandoned the work because he was becoming absorbed in a more thrilling design. The idea of basing a music-drama on Poushkin's tragedy 'Boris Godounov' was suggested by Prof. Nikolsky, and from September, 1868, to June, 1870, Moussorgsky was engaged upon this work. Each Act as it was finished was tried in a small circle of musical friends, the composer singing all the male rôles in turn, while Madame Alexandra Pourgold (afterwards the sister-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov) created the women's parts. Dargomijsky, who heard a portion of it before his death in 1869, declared that Moussorgsky had entirely surpassed him in his own sphere.

'Boris Godounov' was rejected by the Direction of the Imperial Opera on the ground that it gave too little chance to the soloists. The unusual form of the opera, the bold treatment of a dramatic, but unpopular, episode in national history, and the democratic sentiment displayed in making the People the protagonist of the work, were probably still stronger reasons for the attitude of disapproval always shown by 'the powers-that-be' towards 'Boris Godounov.' Very unwillingly, yielding only to the entreaties of his friends, the composer consented to make some important changes in his work. The original plan of the opera consisted of the following scenes: The crowd awaiting the election of Boris, and his Coronation; Pimen in his cell; scene in the Inn on the Lithuanian frontier; Boris and his children, and the interview with Shouisky; scene in the Duma, and the death of Boris; the peasant revolt, and the entry of the Pretender. It will be seen that the feminine element was curiously neglected. The additional scenes, composed on the advice of Stassov and the distinguished Russian architect V. Hartmann, were partially designed to rectify this omission. They include the scenes in the house of the Polish grandee Mnishek; the song of the Hostess of the inn; portions of the first scene of Act 1; the episodes of the chiming clock and the parakeet; and some fine passages in the scene between Pimen and Gregory (Scene 1, Act 2). Portions of 'Boris' were given at Kondratiev's benefit at the Maryinski Theatre in February, 1873, but the production of the opera in its entirety was delayed until January 24, 1874. How often has Stassov described to me the excitement of the days that followed! The old-fashioned subscribers to the Opera sulked at this interruption to its routine; the pedants of the Conservatoire raged; the critics—Moussorgsky had already satirized them in 'The Peep Show'—baffled, and consequently infuriated, 'foamed at the mouth.' So stupid were the intrigues organized against 'Boris,' that some wreaths sent by groups of young people and bearing messages of enthusiastic homage to the composer, were intercepted at the doors of the opera house and sent to Moussorgsky's private residence, in order to suppress a public recognition of his obnoxious genius. For it was the young generation that took 'Boris' straight to their hearts, and in spite of all organized opposition the work had twenty performances, the house being always crowded; while students sang the choruses from the opera as they went home through the streets at midnight.

While this controversy was raging, Moussorgsky was already occupied with a new music-drama upon a historical subject, suggested to him by Stassov, dealing with the tragic story of the Princes Khovansky and the rising of the old archers-of-the-guard—the Streltsy. He was full of confidence in his project, and just before the first performance of 'Boris' in 1873, wrote to Stassov in the following characteristic strain: 'Now for judgment! It is jolly to feel that we are actually thinking of and living for "Khovanstchina" while we are being tried for "Boris." Joyfully and daringly we look to the distant musical horizon that lures us onward, and are not afraid of the verdict. They will say: "You are violating all laws, human and divine"; and we shall reply, "Yes," thinking to ourselves, "so we shall again." They will warn us, "You will soon be forgotten for ever and a day"; and we shall answer, "Non non, et non, Madame."' This triumphant moment in Moussorgsky's life was fleeting. 'Boris Godounov' was not suffered to become a repertory opera, but was thrust aside for long periods. Its subsequent revivals were usually due to some star artist who liked the title-rôle and insisted on choosing the work for his benefit night.

In 1871 Moussorgsky shared rooms with Rimsky-Korsakov until the marriage of the latter in 1873. Then he took up his abode with the gifted poet Count Golenishtiev-Koutouzov, whose idealistic and mystical tendencies were not without influence on the champion of realism; as may be seen from the two song-cycles, 'Without sunshine' and 'Songs and dances of death,' composed to his verses. 'The Nursery,' a series of children's songs, the 'Pictures from an exhibition,' inspired by Hartmann's drawings, and the orchestral piece, 'Night on the bare mountain,' date from this period; also portions of a new opera on a Malo-Russian subject, Gogol's humorous tale, 'The Fair at Sorochinsk.' Meanwhile the stress of poverty and the growing distaste for his means of livelihood—a singularly unsuitable official appointment—were telling on his health. Feeling, perhaps, that his time on earth was short, he worked with feverish energy. Finally, some friction with the authorities ended in his resigning his post in 1879, and undertaking a tour in South Russia with the singer, Madame Leonora. The appreciation shown to him during this journey afforded him some moments of happiness; but his constitution was hopelessly shattered, and in 1880 he was obliged to rest completely. A series of terrible nervous attacks compelled him at last to take refuge in the Nicholas Military Hospital, where he died on his forty-second birthday, March 16/28, of paralysis of the heart and the spinal marrow.

Moussorgsky left four operas in various stages of completeness, but I can only deal at length with the two in which the British public are most interested at the present time, 'Boris Godounov' and 'Khovanstchina.'

The historical drama 'Boris Godounov' was one of the fruits of the poet Poushkin's exile at Mikhailovsky in 1824. Virtually imprisoned on his father's estate to repent at leisure some youthful delinquencies, moral and political, Poushkin occupied his time with the study of Karamzin's History of Russia and Shakespeare's plays. 'Boris Godounov' marks a transition from the extreme influence of Byron to that of the creator of 'Macbeth.' Ambition coupled with remorse is the moving passion of the tragedy. The insane cruelty of Ivan the Terrible deprived Russia of almost every strong and independent spirit with the exception of the sagacious and cautious Boyard, Boris Godounov, the descendant of a Tatar family. Brother-in-law and regent of Ivan's weak-witted heir, Feodor, Boris was already, to all intents and purposes, ruler of Russia before ambition whispered that he might actually wear the crown. Only the Tsarevich Dmitri, a child of six, stood between him and the fulfilment of his secret desire. In 1581, Dmitri was murdered, and suspicion fell upon Boris, who cleverly exculpated himself, and in due course was chosen to succeed Feodor. He reigned wisely and with authority; but his Nemesis finally appeared in the person of the monk Gregory, the false Demetrius, whose pretensions were eagerly supported by the Poles. Boris, unhinged by the secret workings of conscience, was brought to the verge of madness just at the moment when the people—who had never quite resigned themselves to a ruler of Tatar origin—wavered in their allegiance. Urged by Rome, the Poles took advantage of the situation to advance upon Moscow. At this critical juncture Boris was seized with a fatal illness. The Tsars, as we know, may appoint their own successors; Boris with his last breath nominated his son (also a Feodor), and died in his fifty-sixth year, in April, 1605.

The intellectual power and fine workmanship which Poushkin displayed in 'Boris Godounov' entitle this drama to rank as a classic in Russian literature. It contains moments of forcible eloquence, and those portions of the play which deal with the populace are undoubtedly the strongest. Here Pouskin disencumbers himself of all theatrical conventions, and shows not only accurate knowledge of the national temperament but profound observation of human nature as a whole.* Such a subject accorded well with Moussorgsky's genius, which was eminently democratic. He has expressed this tendency very clearly in a letter to Stassov, dated 1872. 'To seek assiduously,' he says, 'the most delicate and subtle features of the human crowd, to follow them into unknown regions, to make them our own; this seems to me the true vocation of the artist.' And again: 'In the human mass, as in the individual, there are always some subtle, impalpable features which have been overlooked; unobserved, untouched, by anyone. To mark these and study them, by reading, by direct observation, by conjecture—in other words, to feed upon humanity as a healthy diet which has been neglected—there lies the whole problem of art.'

By the time this article appears, 'Boris Godounov' will have been played for the first time in England, and the English translation of the libretto—some copies of which have unfortunately been published without my having had an opportunity for revising the proof—may be in the hands of all who are curious on the subject of this opera. I need not therefore analyse it scene by scene. Moussorgsky arranged his own text, retaining Poushkin's words intact wherever that was practicable, and simplifying, remodelling, or adding to the original material when necessary. The result is a series of living pictures from Russian history, somewhat disconnected if taken apart from the music, which is the coagulating element of the work. The welding of these widely contrasting scenes is effected partially by the use of recurrent leading motives, but chiefly by a remarkable homogeneity of musical style. Moussorgsky, as may be proved from his correspondence, was consciously concerned to find appropriate musical phrases with which to accompany certain ideas in the course of opera. But he does not use leading motives with the persistency of Wagner. No person or thing is labelled in 'Boris Godounov,' and we need no thematic guide to thread our way through the psychological maze of the work. There is one motive that plays several parts in the music-drama. Where it occurs on page 49 of the pianoforte score of 1908 (just after Pimen's words to Gregory: 'He would be now your age, and should be Tsar to-day'), it evokes the memory of the murdered Tsarevich Feodor; but it also enters very subtly into the soul-states of the impostor who impersonates him, and of the remorseful Boris. There are other characteristic phrases for Boris, suggesting his tenderness for his children and his ruthless ambition.

The opera opens with a Prologue in which the people are gathered in the courtyard of the many-towered monastery of Novo-Dievichy at Moscow, whither Boris had withdrawn after the assassination of the Tsarevich. The crowd moves to and fro in a listless fashion; it hardly knows why it is there, but hopes vaguely that the election of a new ruler may bring some amelioration of its sad lot. Meanwhile the astute Boris shows no unseemly haste to snatch at the fruit of his crime. The simplicity and economy of means with which Moussorgsky produces precisely the right musical atmosphere is very striking. The constable enters, and with threats and blows galvanizes the weary and indifferent throng into supplications addressed to Boris. The secretary of the Duma appears, and announces that Boris refuses the crown; the crowd renews its entreaties. When the pilgrims enter, the people wake to real life, pressing round them and showing that their enthusiasm is for spiritual rather than temporal things. In the second scene, which shows the coronation procession across the Red Square in the Kremlin, the song of praise (Slavisa) is sung with infinitely greater heartiness, for now the Tsar comes into personal contact with his people. The scenes of the Prologue and the coronation move steadily on, just as they would do in real life; there is scarcely a superfluous bar of musical accompaniment, and the ordinary operatic conventions being practically non-existent, we are completely convinced by the realism of the spectacle and the strangely new, undisciplined character of the music. The truth is forcibly brought home to us of M. Camille Bellaigue's assertion that every collective thought, or passion, needs not only words, but music, if we are to become completely sensible of it.

The text of the opening scene of Act 1 is taken almost intact from Poushkin's drama. Played as it now usually is between the strenuous animation of the Prologue and the brilliant Coronation scene, its pervading atmosphere of dignity and monastic calm affords a welcome interlude of repose. Moussorgsky handles his ecclesiastical themes with sure knowledge. In early days Stassov tells us that he learnt from the chaplain of the Military Academy 'the very essence of old Church music, Greek and Catholic.' The scene in the inn where Gregory and the vagabond monks, Varlaam and Missail, halt on their flight into Lithuania is often cut out of the acting version. It contains, however, two characteristic and popular solos: a lively folk-song for the Hostess, and a rollicking drinking-song for Varlaam (bass); besides frequent touches of the rough-hewn, sardonic humour which is a distinguishing quality of Moussorgsky's genius. Nevertheless the determination to drop this scene from the opera is perhaps wise, for it is doubtful whether its unabashed 'naturalism' might not displease an audience which has travelled much farther from the homely ribaldry of Elizabethan days than had the simple-minded 'big public' of Russia to whom Moussorgsky's work was designed to appeal a generation ago.

With the opening of Act 2 we feel at once that Moussorgsky is treading on alien ground. This portion of the opera—for which he was his own librettist—was added in order that some conventional love interest might be given to the work. The glamour of romance is a borrowed quality in

* See 'Progress and Poetry in Russia,' by Rosa Newmarch. John Lane, the Bodley Head.

Moussorgsky's art. In spite of the charm of the scenic surroundings, and some moments of sincere passion, the weakness of the music proclaims the fact. He who penetrates so deeply into the psychology of his own people, finds no better characterization of the Polish temperament than the use of the polacca or mazurka rhythms. True that he may intend by these dance measures to emphasise the boastful vanity of the Polish nobles and the light, cold nature of Marina Mnichek; but the method becomes monotonous. Marina's solo takes this form, and again in the duet by the fountain we are pursued by the eternal mazurka rhythm.

The second scene of Act 2 is packed full of varied interest, and in every episode Moussorgsky is himself again. The lively dancing-songs for the young Tsarevich and the Nurse are interrupted by the sudden entry of Boris. In the scene which follows, where the Tsar forgets for a moment the cares of State and the sting of conscience, and gives himself whole-heartedly to his children, there is some exquisitely tender music, and we begin for the first time to feel profound pity for the usurper. The Tsarevich's recital of the incident of the parakeet, reproducing with the utmost accuracy and deep simplicity the varied inflections of the child's voice, as he relates his tale without a trace of self-consciousness, is equal to anything of the kind which Moussorgsky has achieved in 'The Nursery' song-cycle. This delightful interlude of comedy gives place on the entrance of Shouisky to the first shadows of approaching tragedy. Darker and darker grows the mind of the Tsar, until the scene ends in an almost intolerable crisis of madness and despair. From the moment of Boris's terrible monologue the whole atmosphere of the work becomes vibrant with terror and pity. But realistic as the treatment may be, it is a realism—like that of Shakespeare or Webster—that is exalted and vivified by a fervent and forceful imagination.

In the opening scene of Act 3, enacted amid a winter landscape in the desolate forest of Kromy, Moussorgsky has concentrated all his powers for the creation of a host of national types who move before our eyes in a dazzling kaleidoscopic display. They are not attractive, these revolted and revolting peasants, revenging themselves upon the wretched aristocrat who has fallen into their hands; for Moussorgsky, though he raises the Folk to the dignity of a protagonist, never idealises it, or sets it on a pedestal. But our pulses beat with the emotions of this crowd, and its profound groan of anguish finds an echo in our hearts. It is a living and terrible force, and beside it all other stage crowds seem mechanical puppets. In the foreground of this shifting mass is seen the village idiot, 'God's fool'; teased by the thoughtless children, half-reverenced, half-pitied by the men and women. After the false Demetrius has passed through the forest, drawing the crowd in his wake, the idiot is left sitting alone in the falling snow. He sings his heart-breaking ditty: 'Night and darkness are at hand. Woe to Russia!' and the curtain falls to the sound of his bitter, paroxysmal weeping.

The last scene is pregnant with the 'horror that awaits on princes.' The climax is built up step by step. After the lurking insanity of Boris, barely curbed by the presence of the Council; after his interview with Pimen, who destroys his last furtive hope that the young Tsar may not have been murdered after all; after his access of mental and physical agony, and his parting with his beloved son—it is with a feeling of relief that we see death put an end to his unbearable sufferings.

Although 'Khovanstchina' may in some ways approach more nearly to conventional ideas of opera, yet foreigners, I think, will find it more difficult to understand than 'Boris Godounov.' To begin with it lacks the tragic dominant figure, swayed by such universal passions as ambition, remorse, and paternal tenderness, which gives a psychological unity to the earlier work. Here the dramatic interest is more widely scattered; it is as though Moussorgsky sought to crowd into this series of historical pictures as many different types of 17th century Russia as possible; and these types are peculiarly national. Except that it breaks through the rigid traditions of Byzantine art, the figures being full of vitality, 'Khovanstchina' reminds us of those early ikons, belonging to the period when the transport of pictures through the forests, bogs, and wildernesses of Russia so restricted their distribution, that the religious painter resorted to the expedient of representing on one canvas as many Saints as could be packed into it.

Stassov originated the idea of utilising the dramatic conflict between old and new Russia at the close of the 17th century, as the subject of a music-drama. It was his intention to bring into relief a group of representative figures of the period: Dositheus, head of the sect known as the Rasskolniki, or Old Believers*, a man of lofty character and prophetic insight; Ivan Khovansky, typical of fanatical, half-Oriental and conservative Russia; Galitsin, the westernised aristocrat, who dreams of a new Russia, reformed on European lines; two contrasting types of womanhood, both belonging to the Old Believers—the passionate, mystical Martha, falling and redeeming herself through the power of love, and Susan, in whom fanaticism has dried up the well-springs of tenderness and sympathy; the dissolute young Andrew Khovansky, ardently attracted by the pure, sweet young German girl, Emma; the egotistical Scrivener, who has his humorous side; the fierce Streltsy, and the oppressed and suffering populace—'all these elements,' says Stassov, 'seemed to suggest characters and situations which promised to be intensely stirring.' It was also part of his original design to bring upon the scene the young Tsar Peter the Great, and the Regent, the Tsarevna Sophia. But much of Stasov's original scenarium had perforce to be dropped; partly because it would have resulted in the building up of a work on an unpractically colossal scale, but also because Moussorgsky's failing health spurred him on to complete the drama at all costs. Had he lived a few years longer, he would probably have made of 'Khovanstchina' a far better balanced and more polished work.

* In the reign of Alexis the revision of the Bible carried out by the Patriarch Nikon (1653) resulted in a great schism in the Orthodox Church, a number of people clinging to the old version of the Scriptures in spite of the errors it contained. Thus was formed the sect of the Old Believers which still exists in Russia.

From the musical point of view there is undoubtedly more symmetry and restraint in 'Khovanstchina' than in 'Boris.' We are often impressed by the almost classic simplicity of the music. A great deal of the thematic material is drawn from ecclesiastical sources.

'Khovanstchina' opens with an orchestral Prelude descriptive of daybreak over Moscow, than which nothing in Russian music is more intensely or touchingly national in feeling. The curtain rises upon the Red Square in the Kremlin, just as the rising sun catches the domes of the churches, and the bells ring for early matins. A group of Streltsy relate the havoc they have worked during the preceding night. The Scrivener, a quaint type of the period, appears on the scene and is roughly chaffed. When the Streltsy depart, the Boyard Shaklovity enters and bribes the Scrivener to write down his denunciation of the Khovanskys. No sooner is this done than the elder Khovansky and his suite arrive, attended by the Streltsy and the populace. In virtue of his office as captain of the Old Guard, the arrogant nobleman assumes the airs of a sovereign, and issues autocratic commands, while the people, impressed by his grandeur, sing him a song of flattery. When the crowd has departed, the Lutheran girl, Emma, runs in pursued by the younger Khovansky. She tries in vain to rid herself of his hateful attentions. At the climax of this scene, Martha, the young Rasskolnik whom Prince Andrew has already loved and betrayed, comes silently upon the stage and saves Emma from his embraces. Martha reproaches Andrew, who tries to stab her; but she parries the blow, and in one of her ecstatic moods prophesies his ultimate fate. The elder Khovansky and his followers now return, and the Prince inquires into the cause of the disturbance. Prince Ivan admires Emma and orders the Streltsy to arrest her; but Andrew, mad with jealousy, declares she shall not be taken alive. At this juncture Dositheus enters, rebukes the young man's violence, and restores peace.

Act 2 shows us Prince Galitsin reading a letter from the Tsarevna Sophia, with whom he has formerly had a love-intrigue. In spite of his western education Galitsin is superstitious. The scene which follows, in which Martha, gazing into a bowl of water, as into a crystal, foretells his downfall and banishment, is one of the most impressive moments in the work.* Galitsin, infuriated by her predictions, orders his servants to drown Martha on her homeward way. A long scene devoted to a dispute between Galitsin and Khovansky, is rather dry. Dositheus again acts as peacemaker.

Act 3 takes place in the quarter of Moscow inhabited by the Streltsy. Martha, seated near the house of Andrew Khovansky, recalls her passion for him in a plaintive folk-song. The song closes with one of her prophetic allusions to the burning of the Old Believers. Susan, the old fanatic, overhears Martha and reproves her for singing 'shameless songs of love.' She threatens to have her brought before the Brethren and tried as a witch; but Dositheus intervenes and sends Susan away terrified at the idea that she is the prey of evil spirits. Night falls, and the stage is empty. Enter Shaklovity, who sings of the sorrows of his country in an aria that is quite one of the most beautiful things in the music-drama. The next scene is concerned with the Streltsy, who march in to a drinking song. They encounter their women-folk, who, unlike the terrified populace of Moscow, have no hesitation in falling upon them and giving them a piece of their mind. Undoubtedly the Streltsy were not ideal in their domestic relations. While they are quarrelling, the Scrivener comes in breathless, and announces the arrival of foreign troopers and Peter the Great's bodyguard, 'the Petrovtsy.' The cause of Old Russia is lost. Sobered and fearful, the Streltsy put up a prayer to Heaven, for the religious instinct lurks in every type of the Russian people.

In Act 4 the curtain rises upon a hall in Prince Ivan Khovansky's country house, where he is taking his ease, diverted by the songs of his serving-maids and the dances of his Persian slaves. Shaklovity appears, and summons him to attend the Tsarevna's Council. As Khovansky in his robes of ceremony is crossing the threshold, he is stabbed, and falls with a great cry. The servants disperse in terror, but Shaklovity lingers a moment to mock the corpse of his enemy. The scene now changes to the open space in front of the fantastic church of Vassily Blajeny, and Galitsin is seen on his way to exile, escorted by a troop of cavalry. When he has gone by, Dositheus soliloquises on the state of Russia. Martha comes in and tells him that the foreign mercenaries have orders to surround the Old Believers in their place of assemblage and put them all to death. Dositheus declares that they will sooner perish in self-ignited flames, willing martyrs for their faith. He enjoins Martha to bring Prince Andrew among them. During the meeting between Martha and Andrew, the young Prince implores her to bring back Emma, and learning that the girl is safely married to her lover, he curses Martha for a witch, and summons his Streltsy to put her to death. In vain the Prince blows his horn, his only reply is the hollow knelling of the bell called Ivan Veliky. Presently the Streltsy enter, carrying axes and blocks for their own execution. At the last moment a herald proclaims that Peter has pardoned them, and they may return to their homes.

In the 5th and last Act the Old Believers are assembled by moonlight at their hermitage in the woods near Moscow. Dositheus encourages his followers to remain true to their vows. Martha prays that she may save Andrew's soul by the power of her love for him. Presently she hears him singing an old love song which echoes strangely amid all this spiritual tension. By sheer force of passion she induces him to mount the pyre which the Brethren, clothed in their white festal robes, have built up close at hand. The trumpets of the troopers are heard drawing nearer, and Martha sets alight to the pyre. The Old Believers sing a solemn chant until they are overpowered by the flames. When the soldiers appear upon the scene, they fall back in horror before this spectacle of self-immolation; while the trumpets ring out arrogantly, as though proclaiming the passing of the old faith and ideals and the dawning of a new Russia.

Such are the two music-dramas which Moussorgsky launched forth to make their way 'towards new coasts, regardless of storm, gales or sunken rocks; towards life, no matter what it has to show; towards the truth, no matter how cruel it may be.' In France they seem to have found permanent anchorage; whether they will sail into the haven of our affections and remain there, is a question that the next few weeks will decide one way or the other.

THE APPRAISEMENT OF PROGRAMME-MUSIC.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

The theory upheld by the Hanslick-Riemann school of aestheticians, that the very spirit of descriptive or programme-music is antagonistic to the essence of musical art, is indefensible except if the proof comes forth that descriptive or programme-music is foredoomed to remain subject to other and less propitious conditions than those governing music pure and simple.

Now it stands to reason that the part played by material suggestion in the much abused imitative or descriptive music—and likewise by each single dramatic suggestion of 'emotionally associated' music, by each abstract analogy in 'conventionally associated' music,*—is far less than theorists aver: it affords, in Mr. Newman's words, but 'the raw material out of which programme-music is made.' It acts as a stimulus to the composer's creative imagination, and not, as one would have the student believe, as a check.

Take, for example, the familiar and convenient instance of chimes. Any given effect of chimes may be turned, for musical purposes, into a motive which will be good or bad, which will be suggestive and pregnant in proportion as the composer is endowed with the poetic faculty.

With the suggestion of a motive ends the part of the primum mobile, whether material or immaterial—form being suggested, one must remember, only by an actual programme consisting of at least two distinct elements. On the other hand, a fact on which theory does not insist sufficiently is that the pattern, length, and tone of any motive predetermines its working-out. The motive of Beethoven's fifth Symphony calls, inside the general pattern of a classical first movement, for other methods of working out than those which suit the motive of Beethoven's sixth (as to modern music, an illuminative comparison may be made between the first sections of Borodin's second and third—unfinished—Symphonies respectively). Creative faculty is displayed alike in inventing a theme and in working it out, possibly even more in the working-out. An inferior composer will expose himself as thoroughly through his treatment of a 'pure, abstract' motive as in a piece of 'materially descriptive' music, despite the semblance of style that he may achieve by closely adhering to standard rules.

The limitations of purely descriptive or imitative music are obvious as soon as one overlooks the part played in it—and freely played—by creative imagination; but that is begging the question, and it still remains to demonstrate that, for instance, M. Ravel's 'Jeux l'eau,' although founded on nothing but imitative motives, do not afford as elaborate a display of purely musical imagination as one can wish for.

Reverting to the case of motives derived from chimes, the student will notice that they may supply the whole material of short pieces like Greig's 'Wedding-bells' and Moussorgsky's prelude to the coronation scene in 'Boris Godounov'; that they may be used in conjunction with another element, and with equal rights, as in M. Ravel's 'Vallée des cloches' or in M. Florent Schmitt's 'Glas'—the other element being, in the former case, the suggestion of the calm of a valley bathed in evening mist, and in the latter a funeral dirge—or appear as a mere episode, as occurs in countless specimens of really programmatic music: in short, play any of the parts that it is the composer's custom to ascribe to motives.

This method of investigation applies to any instance of imitative or descriptive music, and should suffice to convince. However, one can also resort to the reverse test, with similar results, i.e., study the several appliances of any given musical effect in programme-music and in pure respectively.

Let us select the simple and typical one of the holding note. In the prelude to Wagner's 'Rheingold,' it may be considered as descriptive according to our classification. But certainly the composer has kept in view the emotional appeal and the colour of the deep, steady, even E flat, and not specially the apology for more accurate material description. Whichever the case, however, his purpose is poetical and not 'abstractedly' musical.

In the case already quoted of Borodin's 'Steppes of Central Asia' it may, although we cannot neglect the unmistakable expression of the shrill protracted E, be considered as directly suggested by the long even line of the plains. In the 'Wooden-horse' variation of Dr. Strauss's 'Don Quixote' it intervenes, by virtue of what we have called conventional association, to show that the hero has not left the ground, borrowing its justification from 'an analogy founded on a third term.'

But in 'pure' music a variation or any part of a work may as well as not be under- or overlaid by a holding note. In the classical fugue, indeed, the holding note appears—in view of a merely abstract musical effect—to assert the return to the original tonality and emphasise the conclusion. Again, in M. Ravel's 'Le Gibet'—which is poetic music, but neither descriptive nor programmatic—a holding note obtains from beginning to end, its obvious purpose being to produce an effect of harping dreariness and obsession.

Very few such comparisons will suffice to show the student that when he is told that materially descriptive music is music of the lowest sort, he is asked blindly to endorse some dogmatic principle, some postulate which no amount of quibbling has reduced as yet; and that if a closer study of the matter proves anything, the proofs adduced are in favour of the principle of poetic music.

The stimulus afforded by suggestions, material or immaterial, has intervened in more cases than we are aware of. For instance, we are told that Beethoven imagined the motive of the Scherzo of the ninth Symphony whilst watching from afar the lamp-lights of Vienna flare up one by one through the mist; and be the anecdote true or not, we find as little reason for accepting it as for rejecting it.

If it is true, the one instance suffices to show how useful a material suggestion in the hands of a composer of genius may become, even to the ends of 'pure' music. But one should likewise note that, contrary to a current belief, the more abstract data, even if 'loftier,' are not the most useful to the composer of poetic music. Many are inclined to think that a high-sounding philosophic or symbolic scheme must suit the purposes of musical art better than the ripple of a brook or (exceptis excipiendis) the lighting of rows of lamps. And this leads again to the everlasting confusion between mind and feeling. Music expresses emotion through the mediums of sound and of rhythm. Any of the material starting-points of imitative or descriptive music suggest musical elements that are good in proportion as they are themselves intrinsically beautiful and apt to convey emotion. But an abstract notion in itself suggests neither sound nor rhythm; and the more abstract it is, the less emotional. It does not properly appeal, therefore, as a stimulus to the composer's imagination, but only in indirect and less profitable wise. The holding-note in Dr. Strauss's 'Don Quixote' is a mere freak, as puerile as the material imitation of the bleating of sheep in another section of the same work. But it still remains permitted to judge either from the musical point of view pure and simple.

Another case in point is afforded by 'Gideon's doubts' in Kuhnau's Bible Sonata.* There can be no emotional interest in the fact that the entries in seconds aim at reproducing 'the fashion of timorous singers.' But for all that, the effect is excellent; and had Kuhnau attempted straightforwardly to express Gideon's anguish, one may question whether he would have achieved better than the harsh, tremulous seconds—a most daring effect at that time, and one that has long ago passed into the sphere of pure music.

Again we find all separate questions we have to deal with 'crossing and recrossing into each other's territory.' But keeping them apart has at least enabled us to study each point in turn and to suppress many causes of ambiguity.

So much has been written on the one remaining point (that of the actual programme controlling 'the order in which phrases appear and the way in which they are played off against each other), from Wagner's 'Letter on the tone-poems of Franz Liszt' to Mr. Newman's essay on 'Programme-music,' that a few words of summing-up may well suffice.

Briefly, then, as imitative, descriptive and other poetic or dramatic elements suggest motives that may be more pregnant and more novel than merely formal, abstract motives, so does a programme suggest new plastic forms. The more gifted the composer, the more satisfactory the forms that he derives from his programmes. These forms may stand in close relationship with the 'regular' forms—a combination of two into one, or the use of one with certain deviations being no uncommon occurrence—or have nothing to do with any acknowledged type.

Now the perennity of any law of construction is as great a superstition as any of the other dogmatic principles against which our student has been more than once cautioned. Among the many abstract, general definitions of artistic beauty that have been offered, none seems more to the point than that of Diderot's. The sense of Beauty, the French philosopher said, originates in the notion of relationship—a work of art being an independent whole, that has a purport of its own, and whose several parts stand in obvious and satisfactory connection; and artistic pleasure consisting of a perfect apprehension of those connections and of their purport.

A predetermined scheme like that of the classical symphony, therefore, is a great help to the hearer. On the other hand, it does not contain the sum-total of possible relationships, nor preclude other satisfactory schemes. Artistic education consists in acquiring the capacity of apprehending the relationship between parts of a work so as to understand the message conveyed by that work. Why do so many people blindly adhere to the tenets of the past? Simply because they are incapable of doing that much, exactly as many writers of music are incapable of going beyond the routine of fixed methods and preordained schemes.

Diderot's definition helps to explain why many art judges believe pure music to stand on a higher level than poetic music. But after having seen how absolutely independent even materially descriptive or strictly programme-music remains, one cannot doubt any longer that it fulfils all the conditions required, according to that definition, from the true work of art.

It also affords an argument in favour of the opinion that programme-music, &c., should be judged exactly as pure music, and by the same standards. If a work does not contain its own message wholly and unconditionally, if the connections between all its parts are not independent and satisfactory in themselves, that work remains imperfect, and nothing can mend it. If it is satisfactory, any other pleasure derived from it can no more be considered as correlative to the artistic pleasure proper than can be added; for instance, an inch and an ounce: they are altogether different and incompatible things.

To conclude in Wagner's own words, music has been fertilized by poetry, which gave it a new stimulus after the exhaustion of the resources afforded by formal symmetries derived from 'dance and march.' And it is only as stimuli that programmatic elements should be taken into account. It is vain to seek in what measure the descriptive themes in Liszt's or M. Ravel's 'Jeux d'eau' help the hearers to evoke the actual play of waters, or the sequence of episodes in Balakirev's 'Tamara,' the story of the beautiful and wanton Caucasian queen. Once the music is written, the programme has served its turn; if the hearer feels in need of it, the fault lies with him, or with the composer, but certainly not with the principle of poetic music.

MORE HARMONIES OF ScriABINE.

By G. H. CLUTSAM.

In my article on 'The harmonies of Scriabine,' in the March number of the Musical Times, which was particularly concerned with the contents of his symphonic-poem, 'Prometheus,' I endeavoured to show how the composer had drawn all his material from the series of notes that are formed from the vibratory impulse of any fundamental tone. Theoretically, of course, in this series we have been presented with a natural scale that has had several of its rough edges refined in the process of making it practical and pleasant to the ear. The value of its intervals has been proportioned to something approaching an equable distribution for harmonic purposes, and it would be preferable, in a rough glance at the latest harmonic innovations offered by Scriabine in his recent Pianoforte sonatas (the sixth and seventh, Opp. 62 and 64), to accept this distribution with its recognized variants as a basis for analysis, rather than become involved in the complexities attached to the consideration of an awkward scale succession.

In any case, this scale succession inevitably produces a chord with dominant tendencies, comprehending variants of the accepted ninth, eleventh, and thirteenth combinations, and Scriabine's most recent innovations can easily be understood as an explanation of its cumulative possibilities.

The essential difference between the harmonies on which 'Prometheus' is founded and the sixth Sonata is slight. In the first case, the basic chord is:

a chord of the dominant thirteenth with major ninth and flattened fifth.

In the other:

EX. 2.

—the same chord, with minor ninth; and the scale on which the melodic line is constructed, with the same fundamental, is:

EX. 3.

the difference between this and an ordinary diatonic scale being, of course, that all the intervals can, like the whole-tone scale, be assimilated in a complete chord, dominant in all its tendencies. In Scriabine's fifth Sonata, Op. 53, there are many tentative examples of the interesting harmonies that provide not only the foundation but the entire structure of his two later works in the same form, and although from beginning to end there is no definite assertion of a tonic chord (the nearest approach is in the principal subject):

there is always the suggestion of a decided tonality. It might be here pointed out that throughout this experimental work, all chords that might serve as points of rest, i.e., exercising the functions of the ordinary tonic triad, take that recognised form with the addition of an added sixth or seventh:

EX. 5.

The quasi-cadenza in the introduction, with which the work also concludes, emphasises the idea in no uncertain fashion:

But in the works that I propose to consider, even this slight offering to a convention that has been the essential of all music that has counted in the past is deliberately withheld. It is not difficult to appreciate the fact that a definite tonality is always present, but it is asserted entirely by the aid of the extended dominant, unresolved.

The old text-books are generally emphatic in the statement that, above all, the functions of the dominant chord, seventh, ninth, thirteenth, or whatever shape or form it took, were primarily concerned in the establishment of a tonality, but for plausible æsthetic considerations, insisted on its resolution. It is logical to presume that if the influence of the dominant alone is sufficiently potent in its suggestion to fix a tonality on the mind, a resolution proper is actually superfluous. Many composers have recognised the æsthetic import of leaving the resolution in the air, and the earliest to carry it into practice, with elaborate significance that brought upon him the derision of his academic and theoretical contemporaries, was Wagner.

The opening of the 'Tristan' Prelude might be cited as an example of a sequence that suggests a peaceful wandering through half-a-dozen tonalities by means of dominants for twenty bars, when one, in a half-hearted fashion enough, ultimately decides to acknowledge its family. Much water has run down the musical Thames, of course, since Wagner ventured on his innovations in this respect, and his experiments have already entered the regions of the primitive.

If familiarity has justified Wagner, there is every reason to suppose that the passage of time will justify Scriabine, who has many other qualities, besides his curious harmonic methods, to recommend him to the public. Briefly, although they are not concerned with the subject of this article, they convey a superb sense of form, a fine rhythmical force, and a magnificent power of finding in his slender material all those contrasting moods and emotions that go to the making-up of a satisfactory work of art. His technical expression is so sure, that there can be no question of his experiments existing for themselves alone. He undoubtedly thinks in his medium, and his thought is of such fine quality that the little trouble involved in understanding his language is soon and amply repaid.

The sixth Sonata is a little less emphatic in its harmonic foundation than the seventh. Its opening subject, for instance :

although definitely built on the harmonies evolved from the scale (Ex. 3), plays with lengthened appoggiatura (concerned with the insistence of the B and A flat), while the second essential of the double pedal, G-D, provides a curious foundation. It might be stated at once that the flattened fifth in this chord of the thirteenth (the actual thirteenth is absent, of course, in this opening) is frequently to be found in association with the natural fifth which, theoretically, it should displace. This effect is to be found frequently in modern French music, i.e. :

The C sharp, of course, is D flat, and the notation is only for convenience.

The idea of Ex. 7 is persisted in for eight bars, when a brief transposition :

leads immediately to a melodic motto-phrase, which, with many varieties of treatment, recurs insistently with a curious exotic charm throughout the work :

It will be noticed how two distinct dominants, G and D $\flat$, control this phrase : the melody itself is built on the scale, Ex. 3, and in the second bar the essence of the harmonic construction of the seventh Sonata receives a timid statement in the chords :

both thirteenthths; and it might be here pointed out that Scriabine, as in these examples, always omits the eleventh. Its close approximation to the third and flattened fifth, even in distribution, would in its use certainly result in some trying tests to the ear. The effect of the seventh and thirteenth together is probably sufficient for the composer at the moment, but logically he is entitled to hold the other up his sleeve for some future occasion.

EXX. 7, 9, and 10, with an appendix to 10:

and the following clear and significant melody:

Le rêve prend forme.

followed by the undulating figure in Ex. 12, with an inner part of which, later on, significant use is made:

provide the material of the principal subject of the Sonata. A movement that might be taken as a second subject is, in its harmonic contents, a consistent and persistent exposition of the scale, Ex. 3:

prepared by the following scintillating passages based on the final five notes:

Shortly after, a moment arrives when a new arrangement of its constituents appears to relieve the chord entirely of its dominant character:

Occasional Notes.

The ancient controversy as to the proper solmisation of the minor mode has been recently revived. Should the minor tonic and all its other scale-degree relations be sol-faed just as they are in the major key, or should they be named as a mode of a key, and, therefore, from the lah, or sixth of the major key? That is, should the nomenclature be—

Major: doh ray me fah soh lah te doh'

Minor: doh ray ma fah soh la te doh'

Minor: lah, te, doh ray me fah se lah

Musicians not concerned in elementary teaching and doctrine will no doubt be disposed to exclaim:

'Why should all this difference be
'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee?'

But to many thousands of school teachers in English speaking countries the question is a really important one. It is not a matter of choice between tonic sol-fa notation and staff notation. It affects all the 'Movable Dohists' who apply the sol-fa syllables to the staff. As to the tonic sol-fa notation itself the rigorous adoption of the 'Doh minor' plan would practically rule it out of existence. We cannot here enter into the full details of the arguments on both sides. They are all to be found in pamphlets issued years ago. It may be admitted that all the logic appears to be (but is not really) on the Doh minor side, and that the immense mass of evidence of practical teachers is on the other side. Much is made by Doh minor advocates of what appears to be the necessity of major and minor tonics and dominants, &c., being named alike. This on the unwarranted assumption that the mental effect of a scale degree is wholly derived from its function, if we may so describe it. But surely the interval surroundings of a given scale degree are by far a stronger factor in mental effect? It is absurd to contend that doh makes precisely the same appeal to the mind when it has an over-minor third and an under-major third as when its environment is totally different.

If the Doh-minorists are right the Lah-minorists ought to find the minor mode impossible. Yet there is the glaring fact that movable Dohists all over the world sing the greatest music, minor and major, quite freely. They follow instinct and the line of least resistance. The Doh minor plan is largely academic. Before they invite tonic sol-faists to commit suicide the consistent advocates of the Doh minor plan should exact a revision of staff notation key-signatures that will reflect their views, although, at the same time, it will add one more considerable difficulty to the staff notation. Further, we suggest that they should sacrifice time in getting into touch with some of the slum singing classes, the Bands of Hope and, above all, the elementary schools. This kind of spade work need not be, as it is at present, the monopoly of the thousands of humble teachers who find the existing practice adequate for their purpose.

Dr. R. R. Terry has announced that with the co-operation of the Society of Women Musicians he at last sees the realisation of a long-cherished desire—to give a continuous series of performances of the lesser-known works of Bach at popular prices, the conditions being such as the music was designed for (i.e., there will be a small choir and a complete orchestra). Familiar works will be avoided, in recognition of the work of other Bach conductors. It is proposed to give cantatas, chamber-music, concertos, and other orchestral works, preference being given to those least known in England. The choir will be that of Westminster Cathedral and the orchestra that of the Society of Women Musicians. The concerts, of which the first was arranged for June 24, take place at Westminster Cathedral Hall, Ambrosden Avenue, S.W. We hope that the ready public support upon which the continuance of this useful series of concerts depends, will be forthcoming. As Dr. Terry says, it only needs wider opportunities of hearing Bach for the general public to learn that there is no more human composer than—we had almost written 'The Leipsic Cantor'; but never at these concerts, says Dr. Terry, shall this alias be used, either in print or by word of mouth. In this he shows proper respect for Handel's great contemporary. The famous organist of the Thomasschule bears a name that cannot be too much honoured by repetition. The Alexander of counterpoint soars above the rules of modern journalèse. None need avoid the baptismal name of the father of modern music.

One would imagine the life of an operatic impresario on tour with a repertory of modern works to be one of the least enviable on earth; yet there are some that seem to hanker after it. The indefatigable Mr. Ernst Denhof intends once more to inundate the provinces with up-to-date opera in English. The following is probably the most ambitious list of operas ever undertaken by a touring company: 'Rhinegold,' 'The Valkyrie,' 'Siegfried,' 'The dusk of the gods,' 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'The Mastersingers,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' 'Tannhäuser,' 'The magic flute,' 'Orpheus,' 'Elektra,' 'The Rose-cavalier.' We know, however, that Mr. Denhof makes good his word. The tour—of fourteen weeks' duration, from September 15—covers the following towns: Birmingham (two weeks), Manchester (two weeks), Sheffield, Leeds, Liverpool (two weeks), Newcastle, Edinburgh (two weeks), Aberdeen, Glasgow (two weeks).

An interesting ceremony was performed at Reading Abbey on June 18, when a monument was dedicated to what is in itself a monument—our earliest piece of English vocal music, 'Sumer is icumen in.' A tablet presented by Dr. Jameson B. Hurry as a memorial of the song was unveiled by Dr. H. P. Allen, Choragus of the University of Oxford. The tablet, measuring 7 ft. by 4 ft., designed by Mr. W. Ravenscroft, F.S.A., and executed by Mr. W. S. Frith, has a central panel on which a facsimile of the British Museum MS. is carved. The Choral Society of University College, Reading, sang 'Sumer is icumen in,' and the following programme:

The Agincourt song, 'Deo Gracias Anglia,' 1415.
'Pastime with good company' ... King Henry VIII.
'Now Robin lend to me thy bow' }
'By a bank as I lay' ... } Temp. Henry VIII.
'All creatures now are merry-minded' ... Benet.

An amusing story, for the truth of which we can vouch, comes to us from Toronto. An organist had drawn up the order of a Sunday service, and it was in type ready for printing, when the death of an important personage made a change necessary. The organist telephoned to the printer, and instructed him to change the Postlude to 'Funeral march by Chopin.' This is what he found at the end of the list when he arrived at the church:

'A few remarks by Chopin.'

The printed sheet is before us as we write.

'How dreadful is this place. This melodious, thoroughly diatonic little piece . . . is specially adapted for the dedication of a church.'—Musical Times.

Punch.

Yes, very hard, inasmuch as it did not appear in the Musical Times.

THE REVIVAL OF 'BENVENUTO CELINI' IN PARIS.

By M. MONTAGU-NATHAN.

Writing in the Paris Temps of November 22, 1910, Mr. Pierre Lalo, the eminent French critic, son of the composer of that name, asked in tones of challenge: 'We have three Lyric Theatres in Paris; which of them will be prevailed upon to render a belated tribute to the greatest of French composers by mounting "Benvenuto Cellini"?'

The appearance of this invitation in the programme of Mr. Astruc's theatre seems to suggest by implication that his decision to provide modern Parisians with an opportunity of weighing the merits of Berlioz's opera for themselves was inspired thereby. Whether or no, let it be noted that since the disastrous performance in 1838—which event is held not only to have cast a shadow over the rest of the composer's life, but considerably to have impeded the progress of music in France—'Benvenuto Cellini,' in spite of favours received in over twenty Continental centres, never received another performance in that country until this revival.

Paris has every reason to be thankful for Mr. Astruc's enterprise in providing it with this Théâtre des Champs-Élysées. He has endeavoured in designing it (to use his own words) to combine French taste with Anglo-Saxon comfort. But he has completely transcended the limits of this ideal by a rigid elimination of the superfluous in the matters both of taste and comfort. The expression of French taste by means of the gilded plaster of the Opéra-Comique is conspicuous by its absence, for the theatre is built and decorated on Greek lines—with such success indeed that the presence of black-coated men and osprey-plumed women in its chaste marble vestibule is a striking incongruity. As to comfort, in avoiding a superfluity of over-obsequious and cringing attendants, in designing seats which are scientifically comfortable, and in arranging lights so that one's score is rendered readable during the progress of the piece without in any degree endangering the stage effects, the management has achieved something more than the fulfilment of either French or Anglo-Saxon ideals.

There is something in a sense laconic about the method. There is no suspicion of swagger; those responsible for the creation of the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées appear to have been quite satisfied with perfection, irrespective of the capacity of the public to recognise perfection, and there has been no sort of compromise.

And after an expatriation extending over nearly seventy-five years it is here that 'Benvenuto Cellini' has at length been suitably housed in the city of its original production.

In Cellini's memoirs, written (in Mr. Birrell's opinion) 'after a fashion that ought to have brought posthumous justice upon him, and made them a literary gibbet on which he should swing, a creaking horror, for all time,' we read of a statue of Perseus, the casting in bronze of which caused no little misgiving at the Duke of Florence, then the immortal artificer's patron. In 1831, Berlioz recorded in his memoirs that before leaving Florence for Genoa, he took a farewell glance at the statue of Perseus.

In December, 1835, he wrote to Humbert Ferrand acquainting him of the re-publication in Italian of a life of Cellini, advising him to 'read it, if you are not already familiar with the autobiography of that bandit of genius.' He mentioned also that the Paris Opéra Committee had accepted this subject as libretto for an opera, that the music had not yet been begun, but that the book was in the hands of Auguste Barbier and Alfred de Vigny. It seems, however, that Barbier's collaborator was Leon de Wailly, and that de Vigny, the author of 'Chatterton' and, according to Mr. Gosse, 'a convinced Anglophil' (he married the daughter of Sir Edward Bunbury), was merely responsible for its subsequent revision.

From this time until 1838 Berlioz worked upon the opera, and the principal figure in the drama, which was both long and oppressive, was the statue of Perseus, round which the plot really centres. He also included the part taken by Cellini in the siege of Rome, where the adventurer is supposed to have shot the Constable of Bourbon.

In May, 1833, writing to Ferrand, he speaks of representations made by the Paris Opéra authorities with regard to the composition of a work on the subject of Hamlet, but concludes by noting his intention to proceed with 'Cellini,' whose life he remarks has made such an impression upon him. In a further letter, written in the August following, Berlioz tells that he, Barbier, and Wailly presented themselves, 'like three simpletons,' to Crosnier, an official of the Opéra-Comique, that the work was read before them all, and refused. 'We imagine,' he says, 'in spite of Crosnier's protestations to the contrary, that I am the real cause of this refusal. They look upon me as a sort of sapper who wants to undermine the national style, and consequently they have refused the words so as safely to rid themselves of the music of a madman. I have nevertheless written the music for the first scene—the Song of the Florentine Sculptors—everybody is infatuated with it, and it will be given at one of my concerts.'

In April, 1835, came a change of plan. Duponchal, the new Director at the Opéra, entered into negotiations with Berlioz, and made a stipulation that certain changes should be made in the libretto, and in December he again wrote to Ferrand acquainting him that the matter of the book had been agreed upon, but that he could not yet get to work upon the music for lack of funds. 'Like my hero,' he says, 'I am in need of metal.' It was his friend, Ernest Legouvé, who came to his financial assistance with the loan of two thousand francs, and thus procured for him the necessary freedom of which he assiduously availed himself, and by the beginning of October, 1836, he was able to tell Ferrand that he had received a written assurance from the Director of the Opéra that his work would be mounted in a short time—the delay being caused by the prior claims of three other works. On March 13, 1838, he wrote to his father that the opera was in rehearsal, and preparations continued throughout the Spring. Finally, after postponement for a week, it was actually performed on September 10 at the Opéra.*

The full house was surging with excitement. Postponements, articles, advertisements, polemical agitations resulting from Berlioz's critical writings in the Débats, and the propaganda of Bertin, his protector at the Opéra, the composer's recent nomination by a minister as director of the Italian Opéra, and the opposition of the Chamber thereto—all this contributed to the feverish anxiety with which the performance was awaited by the huge audience. A caricature by Benjamin was published in one of the papers depicting Berlioz as a 'one-man band,' seated on top of a puppet-show on the front of which was written 'Grand and extraordinary performance of "Malvenuto Cellini"† with literary pasquinades and musical harlequinades At the end of the show a big statue will be cast‡ also the author.'

This hearing of the work has been likened to a life and death contest between a single man and an (artistically) irresponsible horde. It was clear that Berlioz would secure either a complete triumph or an overwhelming defeat.

The overture was very heartily applauded, a circumstance attributed to the fact that Berlioz was already a symphonist of repute. When the curtain rose on the first Act, the scenery was of so drab a kind as to give the impression that the management, anticipating failure, had been making economies in this department. Thus early, from all accounts, we are led to believe that the opera was already pronounced a failure. People began to leave. Teresa's solo in the approved Italian style, according to M. Adolphe Boschot, served but as a temporary check to the departing crowds. The Parisian audience professed itself disgusted with the libretto, and reserving to itself the long-established prerogative of ignoring serious music, found a ready pretext for condemning Berlioz's score. The performance was punctuated by hisses, cat-calls, farmyard noises—a hideous concatenation. The opera was given two more representations, and removed from the bill.

Upon a man of Berlioz's temper, the effect of this as the reward of fifteen years of struggle may easily be imagined. He was utterly crushed and humiliated. The period of inertia inaugurated by this defeat lasted several years, during which the composer cut himself off from all contact with the theatre—a calamity which, as has been said, has been the means of retarding operatic development in France.

Writing in 1850, Berlioz says, 'Never shall I forget the misery of those rehearsals. The indifference of the actors, riding for a fall, Habeneck's* bad temper, the vague rumours I heard on all sides, all betrayed a general hostility against which I was powerless. The orchestra . . . were cold and reserved with me.

. . . Gradually the larger part of the orchestra came over to my side, and several declared that this was the most original score they had ever played.

. . . Still some malcontents remained, and two were found one night playing "J'ai du bon tabac" instead of their parts. . . . It is fourteen years since I was thus pilloried at the Opéra, and I have just read over my poor score, carefully and impartially. I cannot help thinking that it shows an originality, a raciness and a brilliancy that I shall, probably, never have again, and which deserve a better fate.' Conspicuous among the revivals, by the way, is that at Covent Garden in 1853, where, according to Berlioz, the work was hissed from beginning to end 'by a crew of Italians.'

We are thus supplied with the judgment of the Paris public of 1838, and with the composer's opinion expressed after a lapse of years. It is now incumbent upon us to record the impression conveyed by the performance in 1913. In order to facilitate reference, the argument may be briefly sketched.

The scene is laid in Rome during the Shrove-tide Carnival of the year 1532. The first Act takes place in the Salon of Balducci, the Pope's treasurer, who, having been called by his Pontifical master, takes the precaution of forbidding his daughter, Teresa, to show herself at the window during his absence. She disregards the parental injunction, and whilst at the window a bouquet is thrown to her by Cellini, who announces by means of a note hidden therein that he intends to secure a clandestine interview with her that very evening. Benvenuto duly arrives, but during the subsequent love-passages, Fieramosca, a rival both as sculptor and suitor, and a sort of Beckmesser, enters unobserved, secretes himself, and overhears the arrangement of an assignation for the following (Shrove) Tuesday evening in the Piazza di Colonna, the chief centre of gaiety. Suddenly Balducci returns. Cellini escapes without having been perceived by him, but Fieramosca is discovered, and the furious parent, deaf to explanations, calls his servants, and they with sundry neighbours armed with brooms, sticks, pokers, and tongs, fall on Fieramosca, who gets a thorough trouncing.

The second Act is divided into two scenes: the first is that of a corner of the Piazza di Colonna, showing the frontage of a tavern. Shrove Tuesday. Cellini is presently joined by his companions and fellow craftsmen. They call for wine, but the tavern keeper refuses to serve them until his long-due score has been paid. To them, in their thirsty dismay, enters Ascanio, Cellini's apprentice, who brings from the Pope a bag of gold for his master, but calls upon him to observe the stipulation that the statue of Perseus, which has been so long awaiting completion, shall be cast on the morrow. Benvenuto carelessly promises, pays the innkeeper, and having plied his companions with the required refreshment, sets about plotting with them the abduction of Teresa. She is expected with her father to attend an al fresco theatrical performance, during which Cellini proposes to 'rag' Balducci, and reckons that this will have the effect upon him of causing him momentarily to neglect his daughter. Then Benvenuto and Ascanio, disguised as a white monk and a black friar, profiting by the extinguishing of lights which, according to law, follows the firing of a gun in the adjacent fortress, will carry off Teresa. But the plot has been overheard by Fieramosca and Pompeo, a hired ruffian. They resolve on the plan of assuming the same disguises, and hope to frustrate Cellini's design to their own advantage.

The second scene is in another part of the Piazza, in front of the theatre. The Carnival is at its height. Balducci and his daughter enter, and soon after are followed by the disguised Cellini and Ascanio. Placards announce the performance of a burlesque called 'King Midas,' which now begins. The mountebanks, who are friends of Cellini, have 'made up' Midas to resemble Balducci, whose infuriation is increased by the addition of donkeys' ears to his prototype. The maddened original throws himself on the mimes, and with the intention of profiting by the opportunity, the two pairs of monks and friars approach Teresa, who is mystified by the duplication. The rivals engage in combat, and Pompeo is mortally wounded. Just as his assailant is being arrested by the horrified crowd, the cannon is heard. The Carnival is at an end, and in the absolute darkness Benvenuto escapes, and Ascanio carries off Teresa.

The first scene in the last Act, which, like the second, is divided, is the workshop of Cellini—the time, Ash Wednesday. In the background is the foundry, and the middle of the stage is occupied by the Perseus. Ascanio and Teresa are consumed with fears for Benvenuto's safety. Eventually he arrives still wearing his disguise, and recounts his adventures. Presently Balducci and Fieramosca enter in search of the ravishers. There is an affray which is interrupted by the appearance of a cardinal, who comes to represent the Pope at the casting of the statue. The cardinal, disregarding the complaints of the outraged father, thinks only of his mission, and having upbraided the sculptor, informs him that if the statue is successfully cast before nightfall, he may marry Teresa; if not, he will be hanged.

The second and last scene shows the foundry, where everything is ready for the casting. Suddenly a workman interrupts Cellini's reveries with the news that there is not sufficient metal. Cellini, thoroughly roused, seizes all the metal ornaments, statuettes, gold and silver vessels which adorn his workshop, and hurls them into the furnace. His statue is saved. He breaks the mould, and the Perseus emerges triumphant. The cardinal gives his blessing to the lovers, and the opera ends with a chorus in glorification of the sculptor's craft.

It should not be difficult to perceive from this recital that the libretto of 'Benvenuto Cellini' is not too well devised for its purpose. It is derived from a chronicle which embraces a whole catalogue of liaisons and misdemeanours both social and criminal, and is based upon an incident which its creators have attempted to invest with a sufficient importance by introducing the element of finality. But it contains a certain amount of realistic material which, for different reasons, was inimical to its success at the epoch of its production, and is now accounted a defect on its revival. In 1838 the introduction of realism into music-drama was looked upon unkindly, as savouring of revolt against the prevalent Italian mode, which was cherished by a public prone to take its pleasures lightly. In 1838 the realistic in 'Benvenuto Cellini' was regarded as an intrusion. But since that time the representation of life on the stage has been accorded a considerable amount of attention. In no direction is this more noticeable, for instance, than in the management of stage crowds. The crowd in the 'Meistersinger' has its obligations, and as examples of crowds on the later 19th and early 20th centuries stage, which have assisted in demonstrating the feasibility of securing an approach to vraisemblance, those of Ibsen's 'Enemy of the People,' Barrie's 'What every woman knows,' Charpentier's 'Louise,' and Galsworthy's 'Strife,' may be cited as shining specimens. In parenthesis it should be noted that whereas the carnival scene in 'Benvenuto Cellini' is a decided success, the hustling of Fieramosca in the first Act is quite unconvincing, and in the matter of 'punishment' (in the idiom of fisticuffs) Fieramosca gets off very lightly.

As to the music, judged from the present-day standpoint, while recognising its value as a historical document it is difficult for the sophisticated opera-goer of our time to arrive at anything like a positive enjoyment of it. The student of opera will recognise certain devices in orchestration which must have been novelties in 1838, but the later works of Berlioz have been instrumental in stamping these innovations as mannerisms of that composer. The cavatinas, arias, and concerted vocal numbers, which were really included as a sop to the contemporary public, have none of the brilliancy of the Italian specimens to which that public was accustomed; in introducing an alloy of refinement, Berlioz has achieved dullness. The choruses are, however, of quite a different order of merit, and this is probably due to the fact that a well-written chorus can hold its own in a state of detachment from the dramatic context. Here, therefore, finding himself in a domain of which he is master, Berlioz secures an easy triumph. (On the occasion of the visit under notice, owing to a misunderstanding, the finale of the Carnival chorus petered out in dismal silence—the escape of Benvenuto was made in a blaze of light instead of in darkness, and the conductor, losing touch with the distracted chorus and the bewildered orchestra, had perforce to ring the curtain down. What should have been a triumphant choral and orchestral climax was converted into an ignominious failure.)

The quality of the instrumental music, as commentary upon the action or dramatic interest, is decidedly weak. In certain remarkable instances the accompaniment makes little attempt at description—the hustling of the innkeeper in the first scene of Act 2, for example. Then there are the interminable monologue of Teresa in the first Act, and the dialogue of Ascanio and Teresa in the first tableau of the last Act—in both of which the last degree of tedium is reached.

On the whole, it must be confessed that it is as an opportunity for the student that this revival of 'Benvenuto Cellini' is best justified: the possibilities of its achieving a popular success in the 20th century seem thoroughly remote.

Gade's Trio in F (Op. 42) was played before a meeting of the I.S.M. at Broadwood's on June 14 by Miss Evelyn Rudkin (violin), Mr. J. E. Hambleton (violoncello), and Mr. Herbert Hodge (pianoforte).

GEORGE HOLMES.

By W. H. CUMMINGS.

George Holmes, composer and organist, has received but scant notice at the hands of musical historians. Grove's Dictionary devotes eighteen lines to him. Burney does not mention him, and Hawkins briefly records his name. That he was an accomplished musician is proved by manuscript compositions of his still in existence. He was born in 1681, but his birth-place and parentage are uncertain. His father may have been the Thomas Holmes who contributed ten secular Catches and two sacred Canons to Hilton's 'Catch that Catch can,' published in 1652, now a very rare book. It may be well to notice that Grove wrongly gives the name George instead of Thomas Holmes. The youth became a pupil of Dr. John Blow when he entered the choir of the King's Chapel Royal, probably about 1688-89; the date of his leaving the Chapel would perhaps be 1697-98; certainly not later, for in the latter year he was under the protection, and in the employ, of the Bishop of Durham (Lord Crewe). This fact is proved by a manuscript volume now in the British Museum, which contains some twenty-seven pieces for the organ by Purcell, Blow, and Holmes, transcribed by the last-named 'in 1698 in the Bishop of Durham's Palace.'

An interesting volume, in the possession of the present writer, contains several autograph compositions by Holmes, notably 'A Song on the Birth Day of ye Right Honble. The Lady Crewe, 1702.' This piece is scored for harpsichord and string accompaniments with soprano solos and chorus commencing with the words, 'Bring on Thou glorious Sun the day.' One of the solos, according to the fashion of the age, is written on a ground bass. Other compositions by Holmes in the volume are 'Appear yee nymphs, yee rural swains,' a song for voice and harpsichord with obligato flute accompaniment; 'Love in her eyes triumphant reigns'; and 'Gentle shepherd, leave your flocks,' a soprano solo followed by a duet for soprano and bass, which exhibits the prevailing custom of the time of frequent repetition of some unimportant word, the whole concluding with a four-part chorus.

Lord Crewe, Bishop of Durham, the patron of George Holmes, was a distinguished and wealthy musical amateur, who, during his residence at Oxford, became an active member of the 'Musical Society.' Amongst his fellow-members was Ken, afterwards Bishop, remembered for his musical and poetical gifts, and for his Morning and Evening Hymns written for the Wykehamist scholars. Crewe took his part in the various concertos and ensemble pieces, playing on the Viol di Gamba. He was made Bishop of Oxford in 1671, and of Durham in 1674. He took a very prominent part in the troublous political movements of the day; performed the marriage ceremony, at Portsmouth, which united Catherine of Braganza to Charles the Second, supported Queen Anne at her coronation in Westminster Abbey, and died in 1721, leaving vast estates and Bamborough Castle for charitable purposes; the annual income derivable therefrom a few years ago was over eight thousand pounds.

Holmes doubtless led a pleasant life whilst residing in the Bishop of Durham's palace, and it is probable that through the influence of his patron he obtained the appointment of organist of Lincoln Cathedral in 1705, on the death of the previous holder of that appointment, Thomas Allison. That Holmes gave satisfaction to the authorities is shown by his admission to a Junior Vicar's place on November 17, 1707. This appointment was a welcome addition to his stipend, but involved the duty of singing in the choir; and as it was not possible for him to do this whilst officiating at the organ, he was permitted to have a deputy vocalist in the person of John Hales. During his tenure of office at Lincoln he composed several anthems, amongst them 'Arise, shine, O daughter of Zion,' produced in 1706, to commemorate the Union of England and Scotland. This composition was possibly primarily intended for performance at Lincoln, and presents some interesting features: beginning with a quartet for two tenors and two basses, then a trio for two tenors and bass, followed by a bass solo, then a duet for basses, a duet for tenors, a quartet for tenors and basses, and in conclusion a short four-part chorus with trebles. We naturally infer that the Lincoln Cathedral choir at that time could not boast of its counter-tenors and trebles.

The opening sentences of the Burial Service, 'I am the Resurrection and the Life,' were set by Holmes in such an admirable manner that they have been in continuous use from the time of their first production until now, being much preferred to the setting by Dr. Croft. It is very desirable that this composition should be published and made available for general use; at present it is only to be found in the Lincoln Cathedral books.

We come now to consider Holmes's 'Ode for St. Cecilia's Day.' Husk, in his 'Account of the musical celebrations on St. Cecilia's Day,' prints the words of the Ode with a note that they are by an unknown author; the libretto he gives is incomplete, wanting some six concluding lines. The autograph music of the Ode at one time formed a part of the extensive music-library of the Rev. John Parker, and is now in possession of the present writer. No evidence is forthcoming of the time and place of its first production. Probably about 1708-9 it may have been privately performed in the Bishop of Durham's palace. The music-score shows that Holmes was an apt scholar of Dr. Blow, and was accustomed to compose for voices and instruments. The opening overture, written for strings, commences with (1) a Largo, then follows (2) Presto, remarkable for the profuse indications of piano and forte, (3) Adagio, and (4) Allegro, a very sprightly and effective movement. The vocal parts include solos for soprano, alto, and bass, and several choruses—eighteen numbers in all. The instrumental accompaniments, written with considerable freedom, are chiefly for strings, but there are obligati parts for one and for two flutes.

'A verse on St. Cecilia's Day, composed by Mr. Holmes Organist of Lincoln' was printed about 1709 on a two-page sheet. It is a bright solo for a soprano, in the key of F, commencing 'See the god of wine appears to grace Cecilia's day,' but it formed no part of the Ode.

The composer died young (aged forty) in 1721, and was buried in the precincts of Lincoln Cathedral, where his gravestone still exhibits the inscription: 'Here lyeth the Body of George Holms, late organist of this Church, who died A^d 1720.' It must be remembered that the year, according to the old style of computation, ended on March 24, and each New Year commenced on March 25. The successor to Holmes was Charles Murgatroyd, who was appointed on July 21, 1721.

The London Sunday School Choir held their forty-first Annual Choral Festival at the Crystal Palace on June 18. The junior choir of 5,000, under J. Wellard Matthews, and the adult choir, under Mr. W. Whiteman, performed in the centre transept; and a choral competition was also held.

Church and Organ Music.

THE ORGANS OF CHARTRES CATHEDRAL.

BY ERNEST E. ADCOCK.

France, without a doubt, is of all countries the richest in the possession of the largest number of fine old organ-cases. Examples of these are to be found in the cathedrals of Chartres, Le Mans, St. Briec, Perpignan, and Comminges, and in the churches of St. Maclou at Rouen, St. Germain at Argentan, Gonesse, Hombieux, and La Ferté Bernard. Chief among princes, however, stands the organ in Chartres Cathedral, the case of which is perhaps only excelled by those of St. Jan, Hertogenbosch, and Tarragona Cathedral. It is difficult to do justice to this magnificent organ-case in a mere verbal description, for to realise its beauty it is necessary to see it 'in the flesh' as it were, or to look at a picture of it.

Mr. H. J. L. J. Massé, author of 'The City of Chartres, its Cathedral and Churches,' in Bell's 'Cathedral Series,' says 'certainly it breaks the lines of the view of the nave, but for the effects produced by the sound of the instrument it would be hard to find a better place.' It occupies the upper part of the two easternmost bays of the south side of the nave, and thus blocks out the greater part of two windows. Its entire width is about forty feet and its height about fifty feet, the numerous turrets crowning the main portions of the case rising up in front of the clerestory windows almost to the roof.

Having said so much by way of preface, let us go back to the beginning of things. It is believed that Chartres Cathedral possessed an organ as early as the time of St. Fulbert, Bishop of Chartres 1006-28, and that it perished in the fire of 1194. Be that as it may, there is no doubt that one existed in the 13th century, for St. Louis commanded the Chapter to raise an interdict which had been hanging over the place, and to restore, amongst other things, the organ. This was in 1269, when St. Louis was contemplating a pilgrimage to Chartres before setting out on the Second Crusade. That he was obeyed is certain, for after his visit he wrote in praise of both organ and organist. In 1349 a new and, of course, still small organ was built and paid for out of a legacy left by one Etienne Belot, augmented by* £100 from the Chapter funds and £10 and £20 given by two enthusiastic canons.

One authority (M. Clerval) believes that this instrument occupied the same place that the present one does, and seemingly he bases his belief upon the following note in the Chapter Archives: 'Die Veneris [post Purificationem 1357, N.S. 1358] capitulum voluit quod provisores fabrice possint ordinare prout sibi placuerit, de parvis organis ponendis et custodiendis in illo loco ubi expediencius viderint deponenda . . .' This, of course, is merely a resolution to place the organ in a position which the persons responsible should deem most suitable.

The first restoration known of this organ was in 1462, when Jean Bourdon de Laons received the considerable sum of twenty golden crowns for his work.

In 1475 it was found necessary to order a new organ and case, and the records inform us that it was decided to put it in the same position which the old one occupied. Now most authorities agree that ever since 1475 the organ has stood in its present position, and as no record apparently exists of any removal or alteration of situation between 1357 and 1475, it is just possible that we may be right in supposing that each succeeding organ from 1357 has stood in the same place as the present one.

The order for this 1475 instrument was placed with Gombault Rogerie, a member of the Order of Preaching Friars, of the town of Pons, in Saintonge, and it was the ambition of the Cathedral authorities to possess an organ which should surpass in splendour that in the Church of St. Pierre at Poitiers, both in a musical and an architectural sense. Indeed, they even went further and expressed the wish that it should be 'le tout aussi bel ou plus que menuiserie d'orgue qui soit en ce royaume.'

Unfortunately, the documents which tell us of this transaction, although so very clear upon the points just mentioned, say next to nothing of the stops which this organ possessed. They merely mention '12 trompes, 50 tuyaulx de fourniture sur chaque marche, 16 soufflets'; and moreover, the organ of St. Pierre at Poitiers, which might have served as a means of comparison, has long since disappeared.

Some authorities think that Rogerie's organ case is the one now existing, because certain features mentioned in the contract are still to be found, but on the other hand others are missing. We will examine the truth or otherwise of this supposition later.

In October, 1481, Gaultier Le Marays was commissioned to do work upon both the grand and small organs. To the former he appears to have added a clavier and 210 pipes. Chief interest, however, in this contract, is centred upon the 'petites orgues de lutrin,' for, from a later contract undertaken in 1504 by Jehan Papavayne, a priest-organ-builder, of Vauvray, in the diocese of Evreux, we learn that this instrument possessed a case with two towers with certain ornaments thereon, and these towers were ordered to accommodate certain new pipes which he was to add. We are also informed that this organ was placed upon or below the jubé, for it is referred to as 'les petites orgues du pupitre.' This seems to point to the fact that this small organ hung down from the jubé, and was perhaps placed behind the player after the well-known fashion.

A few years after this the Chapter seem to have become dissatisfied with the effect of the organ, and considered that it not only wanted repairing, but that it ought to be placed in a better position. Want of funds for the undertaking, however, seems to have stopped them from carrying their ideas into effect.

But in 1519, Wastin des Feugerays, a rich sub-chamber of the Cathedral, who had already given of his wealth to beautify and adorn the edifice, conceived the idea of removing the organ to an immense arcade at the west end, between the two towers. Having obtained the consent of the canons he made a contract with Jean de Beauce (the architect who designed the north tower and choir screen) to erect this gallery. The Chapter, however, forbade the use of any intermediary pillars to support the structure, which was to cost 500 'livres Tournois.'

Curiously enough the contract mentions nothing of the organ, but merely says the gallery was to be erected and Beauce was to place images upon it similar to the first two he had designed and carried out upon the choir screen. In his (i.e., Feugerays's) will, dated April 30, 1521, however, he directed his belongings to be sold, and the proceeds to be given for the completion of the structure 'pour mectre les grosses orgues d'icelle église.' The residue was to be given to charitable objects.

For some reason or another the work never got any further than a mere commencement. Why was this? Some appear to think that Beauce could get no further on account of the restrictions imposed by the Chapter. But is it at all likely that an architect of his undoubted experience and ability should begin a thing which he had not well thought out? A more feasible explanation seems to be that the worthy sub-chamber's estate was insufficient to bring the work to completion. Traces of this commenced gallery are still to be found.

From the foregoing it would appear that Mr. A. G. Hill, in Series I. of his 'Organ Cases and Organs of the Middle Ages and Renaissance,' is in error when he says that before certain alterations in the case took place the instrument stood over the west door. The scheme never got any further than has been mentioned.

The west end scheme definitely abandoned, the Chapter in 1542 proceeded to carry out an entire rebuilding of the organ, both as to the case and its contents.

Robert Filleul was the builder concerned, and the contract specified that the Cathedral authorities were to supply him with necessary materials and to pay him 1,300 'livres Tournois' and two measures of corn. Space forbids giving full details of the work done, but it is interesting to note that one item was eight pipes of 32-ft. pitch ('huit tuyaulx en bas de trente-deux pieds en pédalle').

The case-work, designed by Filleul, was entrusted to two inhabitants of Chartres—Roulland Foubert and Jacques Bely, or Beley. The problem is, did they utilise Rogerie's case, which has already been referred to? There are a few features which might have come from that source, but on the whole this contract seems to point to the almost entire disappearance of the Rogerie fabric, and to fix the date of the greater part of the present case as 1542-51, at which latter date Filleul completed his work. The case cost only £20!

In 1581 Guillaume Lefebvre received 100 crowns for work done to the organ, and in 1598 Roch Dangillières, of Paris, also effected repairs which cost £50.

In February, 1615, Crespin Carlier received from the Chapter £300 'pour le nouveau buffet des orgues, and in June of the same year was also paid the fabulous sum of £4,000 (!).† Unfortunately no details of his work are to be found, and it is thought that perhaps two eagles—mentioned as existing on the case before this time—were removed to make room for additions such as are mentioned in 1635.

Again, in 1635 Robert Gouet, of Rouen, received £1,600 for reconstructing the organ, and twelve years later £200 for adding a third clavier of three stops (Cromorne, Voix humaine, and Echo cornet).

Authorities agree that it was about this time when the portions of the case which overhang the jubé on either side were added to accommodate the growing volume of pipe work; they are plainly of later date than the rest of the case, and were most probably added in 1615.

Jean de Heman and Pierre des Enclos, of Paris, were next engaged to do necessary repairs, and mention is made of a fourth clavier ('et faire mouvoir et égaliser les 4 claviers'). This in 1649.

In 1689, 1736, and 1742, restorations and reconstructions were carried out, and it is of great interest to note that there still exists evidence of the 1736 work in a pipe which did duty in the organ up till March, 1911. It bears the inscription 'Mis en harmonie par Charles Ven Schneider j'ai été fait par Moulart en 1846. Ceux que j'ai remplacés avaient été faits en 1737. Amedée de Vial.'

† Comparing this amount with those given in the context, it would seem that this affords an instance where a compiler of records has added a cipher too many.

Luckily the Chartres organ escaped damage in the Revolution, but there seem to have been times during that period when it was either silent or the organists had to wait a long time for their salaries. Then in 1836 a destructive fire did much damage to the instrument, which was thereby unusable for more than ten years. In 1844, however, M. Gadault, organ-builder, of Paris, was paid 27,000 francs for rebuilding the instrument. His organ possessed fourteen stops on the Grand clavier, thirteen on the Positif, and four on the Pedal.

The next organ-builder to be employed was M. Deceunynck, of Chartres, who in 1868 received 8,320 francs for adding 170 new pipes and bringing the action up to date.

MM. Abbey Frères, of Paris, in 1881, brought the organ thoroughly up to modern standards, and when they left it, it possessed three manuals, pedal, thirty-eight stops, and 2,002 pipes.

Thirty-one years of work, however, told their tale, and in 1912, M. J. Gutschenritter (successor to Merklin & Co.), of Paris, was commissioned to make good the ravages of time. New wind-chests were supplied for the Grand and Récit organs, and a new swell-box was provided for the latter. The compass of the manuals was extended from fifty-four notes to fifty-six, and that of the pedals from twenty-four to thirty notes. Slight alterations were also made in the positions and arrangements of some of the pipes, and by means of pneumatic tubes the large pipes in the façade were made to speak more promptly. The bellows and wind-trunks also received careful attention.

With regard to the pipe-work, the show-pipes (of which there are 185) were strengthened and consolidated so as to emit a more powerful tone, as also, of course, were those in the interior of the organ. The reeds have been modernized, and with the exception of the Voix humaine and Cromorne, all were fitted with new tongues. There are now thirty-nine speaking stops and 2,270 pipes. Needless to say, the whole of the pipe-work was re-voiced to suit modern requirements, and now Chartres Cathedral can boast of an instrument which can take rank with the very best in France. The specification is subjoined:

Grateful acknowledgment for help in preparing this article is due to an exceedingly well-compiled brochure 'Les Orgues de la Cathédrale de Chartres,' by M. l'Abbé Ch. Metais, of Chartres, issued on the occasion of the opening of the organ after its recent rebuilding. Thanks in a lesser degree are also due to Mr. Massé's book already mentioned.

The Leytonstone Church Choir Association assisted at Evensong on Monday, June 9, at St. Columba Church, Wanstead Slip, on the occasion of the Patronal feast, the Bishop of Colchester being the preacher. The music included Smart's setting in F of the Canticles, 'Praise the Lord, O my soul,' by Goss, and Handel's 'Let their celestial concerts all unite.' The choir numbered about 120 voices, representing the four churches in the Association, which is now in its third year of being.

At Upper Tooting Wesleyan Church, Handel's 'Samson' was given by an augmented choir on Wednesday, May 21. The soloists were Miss Florence Richardson, Miss Daisy Lambourn, Madame Beatrice Goddard, Dr. McIntyre, Mr. W. Harding, and Mr. S. Clarke. Miss Agnes Fennings presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Allan Brown at the organ. Mr. W. Fuller Clarke was the conductor.

Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was given at the Addiscombe Congregational Church on June 9 by the Church choir and members of the Addiscombe Choral Union. The organist was Mr. Allan Brown, and Mr. Claude P. Landi the conductor. The solo parts were taken by Madame Beryl Benham, Mrs. Harry Burgess, and Mr. Ernst Stefan, and a string orchestra assisted.

A Bach organ recital given by Dr. Cyril Rootham at St. John's College Chapel, Cambridge, attracted a large audience, many being turned away. The programme consisted of the Sonata (No. 3) in D minor, Fantasia in G major, Toccata and Fugue in D minor, three Chorale Preludes, and Fantasia and Fugue in G minor.

Critical and Historical Essays. By Edward MacDowell. Edited by W. J. Baltzell.

[Leipsic: Arthur P. Schmidt. London: Elkin & Co.]

The thoughts of a musician on music are always interesting and to be sought after if the musician is a composer of high standing. If, as in the case of MacDowell, he is also a man of deep perception and exceptional literary gifts, one turns with eagerness to a volume of his writings. MacDowell's 'Critical and historical essays' will repay the perusal of the learned musician and the close attention of the student, for in their æsthetic penetration, grace of manner, fertility of idea, and intelligible presentation of facts and tendencies they form a valuable commentary and text-book on the development of musical art. The essays are a series of lectures delivered by MacDowell in his capacity of Professor of Music at Columbia University.

The first five form an account—we remember none more readable, instructive, and concise—of the chief ascertained facts of barbarous music. The ensuing essay on the music of Greece is quite a fascinating study of its purposes, its lore, and its science. In dealing with the period of the early Church, the later reformers, and the troubadours, the author clearly reveals the changing spirit of music, how it first developed a psychology of its own. To the student these chapters are to be recommended for the excellent perspective they give of the work of such men as Ambrose, Gregory, Hucbald, Guido d'Arezzo, and Franco of Cologne. We confess that the writer has filled in some gaps in our comprehension of the development of the scale and of notation. Folk-song and the progress of musical instruments are discussed, and the author approaches the threshold of modern music. His essay on early instrumental forms is good to read and useful to refer to. The merging of the suite into the sonata, and the development of pianoforte music, are then traced, and the next three essays deal with mystery and miracle plays, the course of opera, and the lives and art-principles of some representative composers of the 17th and 18th centuries. MacDowell then turns to some general discussions, which his clear, penetrating vision and luminosity of expression combine to make a valuable contribution to musical æsthetics. The subject of 'musical declamation' naturally introduces the name of Wagner, of whose art MacDowell takes the following view:

Music can invariably heighten the poignancy of mere spoken words (which mean nothing in themselves), but words can but rarely, in fact I doubt whether they can ever, heighten the effect of musical declamation. To my mind, listening to Wagner's operas may be likened to watching a circus with three rings. That containing the music should have our closest attention, for it offers the most wonderful sounds ever imagined by any man. At the same time it is impossible for any human being not to have his attention often lured away to the other rings, in one of which Fricke's rams vie with the bird and the dragon; or where the phantom ship seems as firmly fixed as the practical rainbow, which so closely betrays the carpenter. In the other ring you can actually hear the dull jokes of Mimi and the Wanderer, or hear Walther explain that he has passed a comfortable night and slept well.

The music to these remarkable scenes, however, does not deign to stoop so low, but soars in wonderful poetry by itself, thus rejecting a union which, to speak in the jargon of our day, is one of the convincing symptoms of decadence; in other words, it springs from the same impulse as that which has produced the circus with three rings.

The final essay is devoted to 'Suggestion in music,' a wide field of which his seeing and inquiring mind has examined every corner. Whatever subject MacDowell approaches he illuminates. His style is one of discursiveness that is usually well to the point. The book shows where music stood in his thoughts, for he insistently dwells upon its emotional and poetic basis. He says, 'music is not an art but a psychological utterance.'

Invocation. For violin and pianoforte. By Alexander C. Mackenzie.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie can always be relied upon for reputable and individual music, and in this Invocation he has lived up to expectations. It is high-sounding music, often effectively rhetorical. A flow of dignified melody marks the composer of the 'Benedictus,' and the energy of thought in the climaxes points to his resourcefulness. The accompaniment draws some new ideas from the harmonic system of the past; its invention is up-to-date without any futurism, and much strength is gained thereby.

The Organists of Chester Cathedral. By Joseph C. Bridge. Organist of Chester Cathedral, Professor of Music in the University of Durham.

Prof. J. C. Bridge has with meticulous research pieced together the biographies of the organists of Chester Cathedral from 1541 to 1877, at which latter date he himself took over the direction of the music, bringing it up to the highest standard of efficiency. Commencing with John Byrcheley (1541-50), we get a kaleidoscopic view of his successors to the present day. Robert White, Mus.B. (1567-70), must be regarded as the chief glory of the past at Chester, of whom is written the following distich, dated 1581, in a set of part-books of Latin motets and services at Christ Church, Oxford:

'Maxima mœsorum nostrarum gloria White,
 Tu peris, æternum sed tua mûsa manet.'

Another famous Chester organist was Thomas Bateson, Mus.B. (1599-1608), best known as a madrigal composer, who died, as organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, in March, 1630. Thomas Jones, Mus.B. (1614-37), also attained considerable fame, as did his immediate successor, Randolph Jewitt (1642-46), whose pedigree is carefully recorded. Edward Orme (1765-77) organized a Grand Musical Festival, when the 'Messiah,' 'Samson,' and 'Judas Maccabaeus' were performed, on June 16, 18 and 19, 1772, the three days' Festival taking place in the Cathedral. A photograph of an oil-painting of Orme serves as frontispiece to the book, while there is also given an admirable photo of the late Mr. Frederick Gunton, who was organist from 1841 to 1877, and who died in 1888. Prof. Bridge is to be congratulated on his research, and it is to be hoped that he will ere long give us his promised work on 'The organs of Chester Cathedral.'

Cedon L'Antiche ('Yield up your ancient fame'). Madrigal for S.S.A.A.T.B. Composed by Luca Marenzio. The Oriana Series.

This is one of the longest and finest madrigals published in this ever-growing series. The original Italian words are given, and a very skilful English translation by Mr. W. Barclay Squire is added. The whole work has been edited by Mr. Lionel H. Benson. The madrigal is one of Marenzio's most successful compositions in this style. The two alto parts are rather high for this voice, or at least we should say that they do not utilise the low and rich notes. There is ample variety of design in the madrigal, and it works up to an imposing climax. No doubt the numerous choirs that in recent years have discovered the value and beauty of this type of composition will be glad to make the acquaintance of so fine a specimen. It is, we understand, chosen as one of the chief choral tests to be sung at the Blackpool Competitive Festival next October.

On October 13 occurs the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Verdi. The village of Busseto, where he first went to school, will celebrate the centenary by the erection of a bronze monument and by performances of 'La Traviata' and 'Falstaff' at the Municipal Theatre, under Signor Toscanini. The ceremonies of the occasion will include visits to Roncole, Verdi's birthplace, and to the villa of St. Agathe, where he died.

CHARGE FOR CONVEYANCE OF VIOLONCELLOS BY RAIL.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Those of your readers who play the 'cello have no doubt discovered during the current year, much to their annoyance, that a charge is made at bicycle rates for the conveyance of their instrument in a light bag which takes up no room whatever in the compartment; it lies quite lightly on the rack, and, if held upright on the knees, does not interfere in the slightest degree with the seating of five passengers each side. This manifestly unfair imposition on 'cellists will no doubt do much harm to the musical profession in keeping out people from learning an instrument much needed for the progress of the art, and the trade in 'cellos must likewise suffer. I have mentioned this matter to certain leading 'cellists, who endorse my opinion, and have lodged a complaint against the Great Western Railway Company, on whose system I have recently been made to pay for carriage in the manner described. I should like to suggest that a petition be drawn up by leading authorities in this important branch of the profession, which could be signed by 'cellists from all parts of the country, and presented, if necessary, before the Board of Trade.—Yours faithfully,

FREDERICK FELLOWES.

SIR,—I am afraid Dr. Grattan Flood has misunderstood my query as to the Windsor organs. I was inquiring concerning the fate of two organs, one by Gray & Davison and the other by Hill, the immediate predecessors of the present Willis instrument in the Private Chapel. The whereabouts of the Green organ, said to be 'a favourite instrument of His Majesty George the Third,' was never in doubt. It was incorporated in the organ which was built by Gray & Davison in 1842 for the Music Room at Windsor Castle, and when this instrument was split into two portions in the following year, formed part of that portion which was removed to Buckingham Palace, where, I believe, it still is. By this it will be seen that it cannot possibly have any connection with the organ (also by Green) which had been erected in Downpatrick Cathedral in 1817.

Is Dr. Flood quite certain that the Downpatrick organ really came from Windsor? I only know of it through a brief reference to it in the 'Dictionary of Organs and Organists,' and from an illustrated pamphlet kindly sent me by Messrs. Harrison & Harrison. These accounts do not quite tally with each other nor with the version given by Dr. Flood, the pamphlet stating that 'there is a tradition that it was first erected in one of the royal palaces in London to the order of King George III.' (I take it that the organ was built circa 1795 and not set up at Downpatrick until 1817.)

George III. was a warm admirer of Green's handiwork, and had several organs built for his own delectation by that master. Amongst them was the one at Kew Church, referred to on page 307 of the May issue of the Musical Times. This was originally built for the New Palace at Kew, and was presented to the parish by George IV. about the year 1823.—Yours faithfully,

ANDREW FREEMAN.

Obituary.

We regret to have to report the following deaths:

BENJAMIN AGUTTER, Mus. Doc., F.R.C.O., at the age of sixty-nine. Dr. Agutter was organist of St. Peter's, Leigham Court Road, Streatham, from 1868 to 1905. He was a native of St. Alban's, and attended the Grammar School there. In 1870, at the age of twenty-five, he obtained the degree of Bachelor of Music at Oxford. Besides his ability as an organist and personal influence as a musician, Dr. Agutter had a claim to high respect as a composer. His Mass in B flat obtained wide acceptance.

MADAME SUSANNA COLE (Mrs. Offord), on June 18, at the Home for Invalids, Holy Innocents' Road, Hornsey. A sketch of her career was given in our issue for October, 1912.

THOMAS POPPLEWELL ROYLE, M.A., Mus. Bac. Oxon., organist of the Chapel Royal, Savoy.

THE IMPERIAL CHOIR AT GHENT.

The visit of 2,000 members of the Imperial Choir of London to Ghent Exhibition was a unique and noteworthy event. Never before had so large a choir left these shores to perform as one unit in a foreign land. It was a bold enterprise even for Dr. Harriss to undertake, and it was conceived in a fine spirit. It is a pleasure to record that notwithstanding contretemps for which no one on this side was responsible, it was achieved with credit to all concerned. To transport two thousand singers from London to Ghent, and board and lodge them, and give three highly-successful concerts, and bring the whole party back safely, was no mean feat of organization. Special trains and boats were requisitioned, and the hotel accommodation was generally excellent. About seven hundred stayed at the handsome new Hotel Flandria, which can accommodate about two thousand guests. I was billeted with this group, and can bear testimony to the excellent management of the establishment. The commissariat department, so far as it was catered for outside the hotels, was not satisfactory. But being very well fed myself, I thought it was almost providential that the singers had to bear something in order to bring out the Christian fortitude they were able to display after justifiable grumbling had found expressive vent.

The great majority of the Choir travelled on Friday night (May 30). The crossing via Dover and Ostend was quiet.

Arrived at Ghent at about six o'clock, the various hotels were visited, and the whole party assembled in a large apartment in the Exhibition for breakfast. This meal was somewhat of a failure. Then the Choir assembled at 10 a.m. in the Palais des Fêtes for a rehearsal with the band—a splendid orchestra of 110 performers, imported from Brussels. After that the visitors were free to rove over the beautiful Exhibition. At 8 p.m., the first concert was given in the Palais des Fêtes. This is a substantial building of no architectural pretence, but admirably adapted for large gatherings. It was brilliantly lighted, and had a very cheerful appearance. It affords seating and standing accommodation for about 10,000 persons. The large orchestral platform used on this occasion held the huge choir and the band quite comfortably, and the graduation of the rise brought everyone under the eye of the conductor.

The audience at this concert was a good one, but it did not fill the hall. It was, however, a very generously enthusiastic audience. Although by a regrettable omission the programme merely gave the names of the pieces to be performed, and not a scrap of information as to what they were about, an astonishing amount of interest was displayed. The appeal was to absolute music, Lieder ohne Worte; and presumably it would have been as effective to them if the singers had not troubled about words. The concert opened with the Belgian National Anthem, which had been arranged for the occasion by Sir Alexander Mackenzie. This was sung in French, and it says something for Londoners' acquisitiveness that the words of this piece at least were recognised. Foreigners are well known to be merciful in this matter. Of course the whole audience was standing, and the military attendants were all saluting. At the conclusion there was a remarkable demonstration. The singers had been provided with little flags attached to sticks, and immediately after the anthem had been sung these flags were waved excitedly, and the Choir shouted cheers for the King of the Belgians. A striking moment! The Choir and the audience were now on good terms. Now came our own 'God save the King' (Elgar's fine arrangement). This was followed by more frantic flag-wagging, more cheers and counter-cheers from every part of the building, and then all settled down for the concert proper. It was soon evident that the huge choir was well under control. The tone was pure and sweet, and the attack was remarkably good; not once was there anything approaching a failure, every piece being performed so steadily. I heard 'O Gladsome Light' from the far end of the hall, and was arrested by the excellence of the blend. This piece caught the fancy of the audience, and it was loudly encored. Coleridge-Taylor's picturesque chorus from 'Kubla Khan' was sung with much effective colour. Elgar's 'Lullaby' was another successful item, the tone and refined execution of the contraltos making a strong appeal. The 'Marksman' needed more dash and rhythmic grip than it obtained from these greatly spread-out resources. Finally came Dr. Harriss's 'Pan' (the briefest title on record?). This is an elaborate work for choir, orchestra, and four soloists. It presents the composer at his best, the orchestration especially being effective. A modern idiom is employed, and there are numerous bold rhythmic and tonal effects—sometimes rhapsodic in nature—that present considerable difficulty. I should not like to vouch for the correction of the choral performance (a full orchestra bountifully employed covers a multitude of choral sins), but it is satisfactory to record that there were splendid moments in the choral climaxes and that there was some delicate part-singing, especially by the female voices. All the soloists were of course efficient. I wondered whether ever before these distinguished singers had sung standing on a not very capacious table. All fear as to its strength was happily disposed of when Mr. Ben Davies climbed down after his first solo. At the conclusion of the concert there was again a great deal of applause, and then the tired choralists sought well-earned repose.

Sunday (June 1) was a misery. It rained and blew pitilessly from morn till eve. It was distressing to see the thousands of men, women, and children in gay attire arriving at the station and trudging drenched through the streets and the sodden and muddy Exhibition roads. It was a fête-day, and amongst the allurements were the Imperial Choir concert and another event of transcendent importance—the prize-fight between Bombardier Wells and Carpenter. The Exhibition grounds were a sorry sight. People were huddled up in search of shelter from the merciless downpour. The numerous cafés did a roaring trade. At least they were warm, and they provided for that odd desire for inward wetting that comes of an outward soaking. It was significant that comparatively few sought consolation and shelter in the splendid picture galleries with their soothing, soft drapery—their sometimes bizarre wall-paper that seemed to kill the colour-schemes of the pictures—and their soft, noiseless floor covering. In the grounds there were numerous notice-boards which indicated where what were called the 'attractions' (water-chutes and the fun of the fair generally) were to be found. But picture galleries and exhibits did not come in this category. The Exhibition buildings have splendid features. The approach from the principal entrance gates presents an imposing view. There is a grand sweep in the great design which combines strength and simplicity, and yet details are full of interest. For all those whose taste lies in the direction of exhibitions there is much to be studied with profit and interest. The city itself has attractive features, but these are soon exhausted.

The possible effect of the weather on the spirits of the Choir and upon the hoped-for large audience was a depressing thought. During the early evening thousands of visitors were disconsolately leaving the town. But notwithstanding all the signs and portents, the Choir assembled cheerily, and an audience of a few thousand persons was there to welcome them. The programme presented was a miscellaneous one, many of the items of the previous night's programme being repeated. It was a sort of recognition of Sunday that shopkeepers who open on that day adopt when they put one shutter up. John E. West's anthem, 'Light's glittering morn,' was a very successful number, the orchestra affording much support. Elgar's chorus, 'It comes from the misty ages,' was another selection that brought out the tone and execution of the Choir with splendid effect. As at the former concert, the two National Anthems were performed, and again excited great enthusiasm.

Thus ended the musical demonstration so far as the great bulk of the Choir was concerned. Some went home that night, but the majority left next day or the following night.

On Monday (June 2) the special event was a 'command' performance given by about 300 members of the Choir (assisted by about 40 members of the orchestra) before the King of the Belgians at his Palace at Laeken, near Brussels. This was a memorable occasion for all who took part. The select choir left Ghent in the morning, and arrived at Brussels about noon. Here an excellent luncheon was provided, and then the whole party was taken by specially reserved tram-cars to the gates of the Palace. After being conducted through about a quarter of a mile of conservatories the Choir were ushered into a domed orangery, also part of the conservatories, where arrangements had been made for the concert to be held. His Majesty had been unavoidably detained owing to an accident on the railway on which he was travelling, and the concert was therefore somewhat delayed. When he appeared Dr. Harriss, who was attired in the gorgeous panoply of his Doctor's robes, was presented, and soon after this ceremony the concert commenced. The choral programme, which was surely much too long for such an occasion, consisted of the items starred in the complete selection of the Choir subjoined. It was listened to with exemplary patience. At its close His Majesty spoke to Dr. Harriss about the work of the Imperial Choir, and the company was led to another large apartment in which an ample repast was supplied. The King himself attended this function, and talked genially in English to the various persons presented to him. This kindly recognition and welcome by the greatest personage in the country visited was a highly satisfactory rounding-off of the whole scheme of the visit.

If this new idea of organizing visits of the Imperial Choir to foreign countries is to be further developed, the question of the programmes to be presented will call for serious consideration. Is it the mission of the Choir to help to cement the union of nations solely by British music? If so, I fear the cement will not hold. At Ghent one yearned for an immense uplifting and profound effect such as might be obtained by the performance of a Bach Chorale—'Ein feste burg'—or, say, the 'Sanctus' from the B minor Mass. The bond sought for must be created by music with a cosmopolitan appeal.

The following are translations of Belgian newspaper criticisms on the singing of the Choir:

The Journal de Gand.—It will astonish no one to read that yesterday's concert was a success. The Imperial Choir, the largest in the world, was preceded by a brilliant reputation, which on the whole it well deserved. We base our judgment principally on the executive powers of the Choir. Never before has it been our privilege to admire such discipline, such unity, and such balance in a choral body comprising no less than 2,000 singers. Effects of remarkable unity were drawn from the singers by Dr. Charles Harriss's baton. This was well exemplified in Sullivan's evening hymn ('O Gladsome Light'), which, however, does not bristle with difficulties. In this connection Stanford's 'The Old Superb' gave a better proof. The interplay of vocal parts was more restless and was not, as in the majority of the choruses, a continual battery. . . . One last remark, Why not distribute texts and analytical notes on such works as 'Pan'? The works themselves would gain, and we would then know precisely what they were all about.

La Flandre Libérale.—It was to the largest choir in the world, the 'Imperial Choir' of London, conducted by Dr. Charles Harriss, that the Musical Committee of the Exposition entrusted the mission of making known the condition of contemporary British music. The first concert of this Choir took place yesterday evening in the large Hall of the Palais des Fêtes, with the assistance of the Ysaye Orchestra from Brussels. . . .

The Imperial Choir comprises no less than 2,000 singers, and we will not deny that we had certain apprehensions as to the cohesion and the pliability of so large a choral body, for there is, of course, a limit to the intimacy attainable between a conductor and his singers, and we wondered whether with 2,000 the limit would be exceeded.

As soon as the Choir had sung the 'Brabanconne' our fears vanished. And when the fine National Anthem 'God save the King' was given we were seized with emotion—it was wonderful. What we regretted at this moment was that the programme did not contain the Triumphal chorus from 'Judas Maccabæus,' or the 'Hallelujah' from the 'Messiah.' How impressively the Imperial Choir would have sung them!

The singers are admirably disciplined. They obey the baton of their conductor as an organ responds to the finger of the organist. At a sign from Dr. Harriss the 2,000 voices begin together, cease together, make their nuances, and vary their sonority as if they were but one powerful instrument. And what a superb instrument! How fine the tone which filled the vast hall yesterday. It is to its impeccable accuracy that the Imperial Choir owes its fine tonal effects.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

Without achieving anything of any very great note, the season at the Royal Opera has pursued its course to date. Signor Caruso has put in a large number of the special performances he was engaged for. He will not reach the original figure proposed, for he has announced himself as being in need of a holiday, and will therefore cut short his visit. That visit has been pleasant enough, but the Syndicate has made the mistake of charging double prices. It is not all quite so wonderful as that. Moreover, the tendency of operatic prices should be to lower, not raise themselves, if anything like permanent public support is to be secured. High prices, coupled with the fact that if Signor Caruso is greater than ever as an actor there is also some falling off on the vocal side, do not match. Consequently all the two-guinea stalls have not always been occupied. In the matter of characters he has not ventured out of the well-beaten track. Radames ('Aida'), Rodolfo ('La Bohème') and Cavaradossi ('La Tosca') have proved sufficient, crowned by a 'command' performance of 'La Bohème' with Madame Melba as Mimì. This brings us to that admirable woman. She has not feared to acknowledge to five and twenty years at Covent Garden, and has duly celebrated the occasion. The public took their share in it—the opera was 'La Bohème'—and overwhelmed her with floral tributes until she herself was overwhelmed in tears and was moved to make a graceful speech. Moreover, she has made further concession by appearing once again as Marguerite in Gounod's 'Faust.' Then there has been the special celebration of the Saint-Saëns Festival. The operatic side of that undertaking proved the more popular. The public were much interested to see in propria persona the composer who has charmed them with his music, and they cheered lustily when he came on the stage between the Acts to receive wreaths, one of them bigger than himself. It was a great occasion, and a very good performance. Madame Kirkby Lunn was there to repeat her fine delineation of the undoer of Samson, and as Samson, M. Paul Franz made his first appearance this season, singing and acting with even more effect than before, and showing on the vocal side at least unquestionable development in his art. M. Dinh Gilly (High Priest), M. Crabé (Abimelech), and M. Huberdeau (Hebrew Elder) were the chief participants in this event. Signor Polacco, the new conductor, directed, and provided an entirely new and decidedly good reading of the score. M. Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande' has come into the field again after being shut out for a year, and Madame Edvina and M. Maguenat (a new-comer) as the two chief characters, provided a due proportion of the nebulousness typical of the work; M. André Caplet (his first appearance) and the orchestra did the rest, not forgetting the clever scene-painters. Last year's novelty, Wolf-Ferrari's 'Jewels of the Madonna,' has been played, and 'Madama Butterfly' has shown that she retains her hold on the public. Miss Alice Neilson was a sprightly exponent, and then Madame Destinn with Mr. John McCormack, and then Signor Martinelli as the forgetful lieutenant, with both M. Gilly and Signor Sammarco as the Consul in turn have given its music. M. Charpentier's 'Louise' has once more shown itself to be firmly established in popular esteem, especially with the help of Madame Edvina and M. Franz. M. Aquistapace, who is a new and promising member of the company, appeared as the Father, and did so in a new and promising fashion. Madame Bérat as the Mother, and the well-managed stage pictures, were as telling as ever. Again there was an individual reading from Signor Polacco. The list concludes with one solitary performance of 'La Traviata,' for the sake of Madame Melba, who seems to be the only living singer with the true faith as regards Verdi's music. In the conducting of 'Faust' and of other operas, Signor Panizza has had a helpful and sympathetic share.

FRANCIS E. BARRETT.

'ARIADNE IN NAXOS.'

Richard Strauss's latest opera, which was produced with much éclat at Stuttgart last October, was brought to a hearing in this country by the commendable joint-enterprise of Sir Herbert Tree and Mr. Thomas Beecham. Eight performances were given at His Majesty's Theatre, the first on May 27 and the last on June 7.

When Molière in his 'Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme' allowed the pupil of the music-master to compose music for the entertainment of M. Jourdain's guests, he did not dream that the incident would be amplified into a full-blown opera by the collaboration of such a dramatist as Hugo Von Hofmannsthal and a world-famous musician. In the original play the dancing-master was also expected to contribute an item to the entertainment, and in the modern version this grows into a fantastic, impossible 'Nachspiel,' the plot of which revolves around the inconstant amours of Zerbinetta, who is pursued by four lovers. The musician's work is in quite another vein. Ariadne, in an uncomfortable cave on a desert island, weeps copiously over the desertion of Theseus, but in the end is easily consoled by Bacchus. Then, besides the two pieces, there are to be fireworks for the amusement of the guests. Finding the time-table impracticable, and resolving to have everything he has paid for, the egregious M. Jourdain settles that the two pieces must be performed simultaneously. Dismay for author and composer and chaos for performers! But it is a case of that or nothing, and a sorry compromise has to be hurriedly arranged. So we have here Hofmannsthal's play, a strange medley, quaint as a child's fairy-story, casual and inconsequent. This concoction is performed to M. Jourdain's guests, who intersperse occasional criticisms.

An adaptation of Molière's original comedy precedes the opera. For the English presentation this version has been adapted by Mr. Somerset Maugham under the title of 'The Perfect Gentleman.' It may be well to mention in this connection that a very readable translation of the German libretto of the opera, by Mr. Alfred Kalisch, has been issued. For the play, Strauss provides incidental music of very attractive quality. In fact for our part we enjoyed it rather more than we did the music to the opera: it is full of charm and daintiness. The music to the opera has many strong emotional appeals. The earlier part is especially flowing and melodious, and aptly fitted to the curiously fantastic situations that arise out of the mixed ideas of the concurrent plays. As the opera draws to a close, the love-making of Bacchus and Ariadne becomes tedious, and the Finale generally does not leave a wholly satisfactory feeling. The orchestration is peculiar. It calls for thirty-seven players, and among the instruments employed are a harmonium, a celeste, and a pianoforte (played by Mr. Vernon Warner).

The cast of the play included Sir Herbert Tree (M. Jourdain), and Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry (Dorimene), and was generally very efficient. In the opera, Madame Eva von der Osten appeared as Ariadne in the earlier representations, and Madame Theo Drill-Orridge on later occasions. Madame Hermine Bosetti was an admirable Zerbinetta, and Herr Otto Marak was a fine Bacchus. He appeared only in the first performance, the part later being taken by Mr. Robert Hutt. Mr. Thomas Beecham conducted with his usual spirit and zeal. Sometimes he could not get the singers to agree with his tempi, but generally the performances were smooth. The opera was performed in German.

'SUOMEN LAULU': THE FINNISH CHOIR.

Choral practice is a prominent feature of the social life of the Finns. Mixed-voice and male-voice choirs abound. Of all the choral organizations in the country, the one known as 'Suomen Laulu' (the Song of Finland) by general consent holds the highest place. It was originally a male-voice choir, and later became a mixed-voice body. Under its very able conductor, Dr. Heikki Klemetti, the Choir has done much to raise the standard of choral performances in Finland and to widen repertoires. The visit to this country was insufficiently made known, or at least in those circles to which the performance of a celebrated choir would appeal. The audiences that attended the three concerts given at Queen's Hall on June 13, 18, and 20 were not large, but they were warmly appreciative. The repertory of the Choir as presented in their London programmes consisted mainly of compositions by native composers, and so far as we heard it was wholly a cappella. Naturally, compositions of Sibelius and Järnefelt—to mention the names best known to us—were included. There were others of considerable merit by the conductor, perfect unity of their tone-colour rather than by depth and profundity. The speciality of the singing, however, was not so much by way of splendid tone-quality as it was beautiful execution. The obvious point was the complete unity of the whole body. They were perfectly plastic in obeying all the demands of their conductor who, it should be noted, secured all the effects, climaxes included, without demonstration. In fact, one was hardly aware of his presence. Another point of their technique was its almost perfect intonation. As to rhythmic attack they were perfectly compact, but in the matter of tonal attack were not so perfect, for it was possible to detect occasional curved approaches, in both soprano and bass parts, the centre of the pitch not being at once reached. But when all is said regarding the equipment and technique of the Choir the greater matter was the artistry of the execution and the moodiness of the interpretations. All sang from memory—in fact, they did not bring any music copies, and were therefore able to fix their whole attention on the conductor and to sing with self-expression.

and the skilful accompanist of the songs, Mr. Selim Palmgren. Dr. Klemetti is an admirer of the English madrigalian school, and has brought forward at his concerts many compositions of the Elizabethan period. In the London programmes Thomas Morley was represented by 'My charming love' ('My bonny lass').

The modern Finnish music heard at these concerts had often a winning appeal. Its idiom sounds new to our ears, and a certain pensive sadness seems to prevail fairly often. The words to which the music is set invite this melancholy. But there were moments of joy and vivacity that were very welcome. The Choir consisted of about sixty singers, the ladies, and especially the sopranos, predominating. More bass would have been an advantage. The sopranos have a timbre that is bright and clear, and when urged to climax, penetrating rather than full. The contraltos seemed to have what we should call second soprano quality, the low notes, although always musical, not displaying that rich sonority that is associated with true contralto quality. The tenors had a blundering tone that was never intrusive or strident, and the basses were distinguished by the

The composers represented in the programmes were Arcadelt, Bruckner, Corsi (by a fine motet, 'Adoramus Te'), Hassler, Madetoja, Klemetti, Merikanto, Kaula (by a long and very impressive piece, 'The Appletrees'), Lotti, Thos. Morley, Palestrina, Palmgren, Tchaikovsky, Sibelius (by his fine 'Boat song'). Madame Maikki Järnefelt, one of the most justly famous singers in Finland, sang numerous songs by some of the composers named above. She is an artist of high rank, using a beautiful voice in displaying her alluring temperament. As we have said, the audience was enthusiastic, and it was curious to note that at the concert given on June 18, at least, this warm appreciation was taken as a desire for encores, which were readily conceded, nearly every piece in the programme being performed twice.

It was regrettable that during their stay here the Finnish Choir had no opportunity of hearing our best a cappella choirs. We feel sure that had they been able to hear them there would have been mutual appreciation. For our part we offer Dr. Klemetti and his Choir the homage of our deepest respect for their admirable achievements, and we trust they will be encouraged to come to us again very soon.

THE ORIGIN OF TUNES MENTIONED BY DICKENS.

The review of Mr. J. T. Lightwood's delightful little book, 'Charles Dickens and Music,' in the February number of the Musical Times, raises questions which go beyond the work or its review. 'Nationalism' in music is a subject lately come more to the front, and with it greater need for accuracy in dealing with points of evidence. In this connection I venture to make some remarks upon the review in question. The reviewer accuses Mr. Lightwood of being inaccurate as to the origin of 'Jim Crow' and 'Yankee Doodle.' Mr. Lightwood tells us that 'Jim Crow' was introduced into England by the negro impersonator Rice, who sang it in a sketch at the Surrey Theatre in 1836, and that 'Yankee Doodle' has been traced to Aird's selection, cir. 1775 or 1776. There is no disputing these statements. Regarding 'Buffalo Gals,' Mr. Lightwood says that it was sung by the 'Original Female American Serenaders' about 1845. The reviewer states that it is 'not a Christy Minstrel song; it was composed by Henry Russell.'

Mr. Lightwood does not claim for it a Christy Minstrel origin, though he would have been correct if he had said it was sung by them. As a matter of fact it was sung by many troupes of 'serenaders' before the advent of the Christy Minstrels, and in an early copy of it, now before me, in 'Twelve Ethiopian Songs sung by the Serenaders,' a footnote tells the reader that 'The tune of "Buffalo Gals" is taken from an old air by Gluck.' Without entering into this question, it may be distinctly stated that it is not by Russell.

The reviewer says that Captain Cuttle's song, 'Lovely Peg' is 'almost certain' to be 'Lovely Peg,' 'Arne's well-known song to Garrick's words in praise of Peg Woffington.' A glance at chapter ix. of 'Domby' will show that both Mr. Lightwood and his reviewer are at fault; for Dickens tells us that this song, which the captain had selected from many others which had been fluttering on a dead wall in the Commercial Road, 'set forth the courtship and nuptials of a promising young coal-whipper with a certain "Lovely Peg" the accomplished daughter of the master and part-owner of a Newcastle collier.'

The reviewer asserts that 'Believe me if all those endearing young charms' is 'certainly Irish, while "Oft in the stilly night" was as certainly composed by Stevenson.' Regarding the former melody, Mr. Lightwood very properly says authorities differ, and that the balance of opinion is in favour of its English origin. Until more is known regarding the history of this air, he is justified in this conclusion.

'Oft in the stilly night' is also a matter of uncertainty. It was published with Stevenson's harmonies in Moore's 'National Airs' (1818), as 'Scottish'; also it may be mentioned that the poet, in a letter dated November 5, 1816, says that it was done with other songs 'during his (Stevenson's) last moments at Mayfield Cottage.' This does not imply composition of melody, and it is certainly not clear whether Moore or Stevenson worked up this air from some Scottish source.

The reviewer tells us that "'My heart's in the Highlands'" is really an Irish air known as "The strong walls of Derry," which was printed in 1740.' The fact is this air was printed by James Oswald in his 'Curious Collection of Scots tunes' in 1740, and at a later date in his 'Caledonian Pocket Companion' under the Gaelic title 'Failte na miosg,' which may be translated as 'The salute of the musket.' There is no publication of the air as 'The strong walls of Derry' until much more recent times.

FRANK KIDSON.

CHORAL PRELUDES.

On June 17 Mr. Charles Macpherson was the lecturer at the Musical Association meeting, choosing for his subject 'Choral preludes, ancient and modern.' He alluded to the great interest which was now taken in this form of composition, so that it would be possible for a recitalist to give a whole programme consisting of choral preludes alone without incurring the charge of sameness, there being so wide a variety of styles. After referring to the origin of the words of the chorale in Germany, Mr. Macpherson showed how much the development of the music was owing to Martin Luther, who successfully established a type of tune giving the lead to hundreds of others from many sources, including old Church melodies, secular tunes, and love-songs.

Owing to the early cumbersome construction of organs, they were unsuited to accompany the choir, and so the instrument was used to give the tone to the priest or choir, and to play between the verses sung by the choir. Frescobaldi, who was noted for his interlude playing, probably owed much to Sweelinck, whom he heard at Antwerp. The choral prelude as an independent art-form began to assert itself when the custom of playing the organ between the verses died out. Sweelinck and Samuel Scheidt, his pupil, paved the way for Buxtehude, Pachelbel, and Böhm. Buxtehude either treated the melody simply, with occasional embellishments, or used fragments of it in the various parts,—according as his fancy suggested; Pachelbel's practice was rather to anticipate each line of the tune by a fugal exposition formed from the notes on that line which appeared in longer notes at its end; and Böhm paraphrased the melody which he accompanied simply but with plenty of interesting movement. He also used the basso ostinato. Buxtehude's method might be called brilliant and instrumental, Pachelbel's dignified and voice-like, and Böhm's consistently developed.

Many later composers led up to J. S. Bach, who exhibited in a coherently vitalised form the style of his predecessors. He adopted, however, a fresh standpoint. Instead of taking the melody, as they did, as the sole source of inspiration, he always looked to the words for guidance in his treatment.

The general term 'choral prelude' covered a wide variety of forms. In his sixty-six pieces in Op. 65, Karg-Elert, under the title of 'Choral Improvisations,' included phantasies, preludes, postludes, symphonic pieces, trios, and toccatas. This composer and Max Reger had reproduced the texture and polyphony of Bach in modern idiom, but the former was less angular than the latter, and seemed to show more spiritual insight.

In this country several composers, particularly Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Charles Stanford, Dr. Charles Wood, and Dr. C. H. Kitson, were producing excellent specimens of this form of composition, and we might well be proud of their products.

After the lecture, Mr. Macpherson played in masterly style on the organ at St. George's, Hanover Square, choral preludes by Scheidt (1587-1654), Buxtehude (1637-1707), Pachelbel (1653-1706), Böhm (1661-1733), Walther (1684-1748), Bach, Clausnitzer, Brahms, Ravanello, C. Wood, C. H. Kitson, Stanford, Reger, Karg-Elert, and C. H. H. Parry.

BACH LITERATURE.

The Bach-Jahrbuch for 1912, just issued, contains several remarkable articles. Prof. Werner Wolfheim describes the early MS. (about 1708) he has recently acquired, which contains two unknown pieces by Bach, and many other interesting compositions. One piece is in Bach's autograph. The new works of Bach are given in an appendix. One is a Prelude to the Fugue in A major (Bach-Ges. vol. xxxvi.). It is of little interest, and probably a boyish attempt. The other, also an early but far more important work, is a 'Preludium e Partita del Tuono Terzo di J. S. B.' It consists of an Andante (fugato), Allemande, Courante, Sarabande (with Double), and Air; all the pieces are fresh and melodious, suggesting the Handelian spirit. 'Tuono Terzo' here means F major. In all, the MS. contains eleven pieces by Bach, ten by Böhm, and thirty by other composers.

Of other articles, a disquisition on Bach's motets, by B. F. Richter, deserves special mention. Besides an argument for their intention as funeral music, there is an account of the performances at the Saturday afternoon motets at St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig. Unfortunately, no records remain until the newspaper announcements of September, 1811; since then the Leipziger Tageblatt every Saturday has regularly announced the Sunday 'church music' (that is, with orchestra) and the Saturday afternoon motets. In 1812 there were eight performances of Bach's motets, and this seems about the average number. 'Sing to the Lord a new-made song' and 'The Spirit also helpeth us' have been performed much oftener than the others; 'Come, Jesus, come,' the hardest, is least often selected. It should be explained that the motet performances are the affair of the four choir-prefects in rotation; the Cantor has nothing to do with them, either in selection or execution. They are first mentioned in 1694, in terms which show they had long existed even then. In Bach's time accompaniments were used, as Kirnberger has described; afterwards the fashion of unaccompanied singing began, and the difficulty of Bach's motets was much increased. Still, when Mozart visited Leipzig in 1789, the Thomauer were ready to perform 'Sing to the Lord a new-made song.' The famous choir is now so skilled that when a distinguished personage visited the school he was asked which of Bach's motets he would like to hear: the choir without preparation could give any of them. The Jahrbuch contains a list of recent performances of Bach's works; as regards England and France it is strangely deficient.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' ANNUAL DINNER.

The Annual Dinner of this well-established institution always draws a distinguished gathering of the profession. This year the function was held on June 5 at the Frascati Restaurant, Dr. C. Harford Lloyd, the president of the College, taking the chair. The speeches, which occupied a large portion of the evening, were pleasantly mitigated by the excellent banquet provided by the caterers. A letter from Dr. Saint-Saëns was read, in which he expressed his regret that he could not be present. Sir Walter Parratt bore testimony to the great educative influence of the College. He spoke on the perennial question of the quality of Church music, and incidentally stated his opinion that while the Church Music Society did some good, it also did a considerable amount of harm. The Society seemed to think that anything that was 300 years old must be good. He advised organists to be catholic in their tastes. He alluded to the attempts being made to get rid of Anglican chants. He was in favour of the partial use of Plain-song, but he did not intend to sacrifice his heritage of beautiful Anglican chants, the product of over 300 years. Sir Frederick Bridge made, as usual, a humorous speech, in which he supported Sir Walter Parratt in his attitude towards Anglican music. Prof. J. C. Buck made some thoughtful remarks in which he said that in these days they should be glad of anything that kept a link with the past, provided it was the right link. Dr. F. G. Shinn, Dr. Alcock, the Dean of Christ Church, Oxford, Sir George Martin, the President, the Rev. Childs Clarke, Mrs. J. S. Curwen, Dr. Harding (hon. secretary), Dr. C. W. Pearce, and Mr. T. Spindler also spoke. There was no music, unless an inadequate attempt to sing the National Anthem may come under that category.

BRITISH MUSIC TRADES CONVENTION.

The annual Conference of this body was held at Buxton on May 23-26. About three hundred members were present. The commodious Empire Hotel was requisitioned for the occasion. The President, Mr. William Rushworth, said that British manufactures of pianofortes had progressed enormously during the last few years. He remarked that one evil they must set themselves to abolish was the stencilling of cheap foreign pianofortes with names that enabled agents to derive an extortionate profit.

Many subjects of interest to the trade were discussed, and Dr. C. W. Pearce read a paper on 'Music as an essential factor in modern education.' Dr. McNaught was to have spoken on 'State aid to music,' but he was unable to attend. On the concluding day Mr. Herbert Brinsmead, the popular secretary, was the recipient of a presentation. It was generally recognised that the success of the Convention was mainly owing to his assiduity and skill.

The townsfolk extended a hearty welcome to the visitors.

THE SAINT-SAËNS CELEBRATION.

As an artistic tribute to a distinguished man, and as an example of his worthiness to receive it, the concert given in honour of Dr. Camille Saint-Saëns at Queen's Hall on June 2 left nothing wanting. Readers of the Musical Times know how the esteem in which M. Saint-Saëns is held by English musicians thus found universal expression. At the completion of seventy-five years of musical life he is still doing good service to the Art. The admiration of the musical world on this side of the Channel was ready to find voice, and the active impulse was given by the energies of M. Saint-Saëns's old friend, Mr. Hermann Klein. The response was immediate, a committee of great influence was soon formed, and an invitation was sent to M. Saint-Saëns to attend an orchestral concert that should fully represent him as composer and pianist, and to lend his presence to a special performance of his opera 'Samson et Dalila' at Covent Garden (described in another column). The orchestra engaged for the concert was that of Mr. Thomas Beecham, who conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture in G to an Unfinished Comedy	Saint-Saëns
Symphony in C minor	Saint-Saëns
Pianoforte concerto in B flat	Mozart
'Serenade'	Saint-Saëns
Scherzo from Pianoforte concerto in G minor	Saint-Saëns
Finale from Pianoforte concerto in F	Saint-Saëns
Fantasia, 'Africa'	Saint-Saëns

'The Overture to a comedy,' which was new to us, dates from 1854. It is fresh in inspiration, neatly turned and neatly scored. In many ways M. Saint-Saëns is the French Mozart. The remainder of the music in the programme was familiar, and does not call for exhaustive comment. It gave a comprehensive view of M. Saint-Saëns's instrumental style, which combines the French spirit, dignity of thought, force of expression, and a respect for classical form. His universality could scarcely have been better exemplified. As a pianist he claimed our wonder. The grace of style, technical finish, and youthful ardour of his playing were nothing less than extraordinary in a man of seventy-eight years. Full recognition of his genius was made by the audience, and utmost enthusiasm prevailed throughout.

In the interval, Sir Alexander Mackenzie made a short speech and read the following address:

TO CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS.

We, the undersigned, desire to offer you our sincere and cordial congratulations on attaining the seventy-fifth anniversary of the commencement of your distinguished career, reckoned from the date when, at the age of two-and-a-half years, you received your first lesson in pianoforte-playing.

It is a source of especial gratification to us that the public celebration of this interesting event should be held in England. Your artistic association with this country has now endured more than forty years, and your presence here at regular intervals, whilst ever enhancing our appreciation of your supreme gifts, both as a composer and an executant, has helped not a little to strengthen the musical 'entente' between your great land and our own.

Moreover, your fame during that period has become universal. Amid the varied developments of modern music, you have worthily upheld the highest traditions of your national Art: you have been the champion of its cause and carried its classic banner from triumph to triumph. With 'progress' for your watchword and with unique versatility, you led the advance of French music in every branch, and you are justly acknowledged to-day to be its most gifted and most exalted representative.

We share in ample measure the satisfaction which you must feel in being still able to take an active part in the execution of an exacting concert programme on the occasion of this remarkable Jubilee; and we trust that you may yet be spared for many years to crown with further successes your long and brilliant career.

The composer was then presented with a magnificent laurel-wreath, and responded with a few words spoken in French.

London Concerts.

A GERMAN CHOIR CONCERT.

At Queen's Hall, on May 29, an interesting concert was given on behalf of the Kaiser's Jubilee Fund for the relief of Germans living in Great Britain and Ireland. Attention was centred upon the singing, en masse, of the four chief German choirs of London—the 'Liedertafel,' the 'Liederkrantz,' the 'Freundschaft,' and the West London Choir, numbering in all about 200 voices. The conductors were Herr Schröder and Dr. Kern, Prof. Max Laistner being unfortunately prevented from sharing these duties by indisposition. The choir was well-balanced, and sang with good tone and enunciation, and a vigorous style. Except for some jerkiness and roughness in the climaxes the singing was of a high order. At times, however, one missed that wonderful resonance, smoothness, and delicacy of tone so long associated with our best English male choirs. Herr Schröder secured a delightful performance of Goldmark's 'Frühlingsnetz,' a well-written piece for male choir, pianoforte, strings, and four horns. In Brahms's 'Wiegenlied' and the old German folk-song 'Untreue' (unaccompanied) the choir sang with great charm and delicacy. The soloists of the concert were Miss Elena Gerhardt, who again upheld her great reputation, Madame Sobrino, Herr Karl Mott, and Herr Bronislaw Huberman (violinist). Pieces for string orchestra were conducted by Herr Schröder, and the concert concluded with a performance of Kremser's 'Alfriederländisches Dankgebet' for choir and organ, a favourite piece with the Kaiser.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The recent concerts of the series given by the London Symphony Orchestra have been of exceptional interest. On May 26, for instance, Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra' was performed under Herr Mengelberg, with the full brilliance and glowing warmth that we have learnt to expect from his Strauss interpretations, especially with these players. Under his direction, Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto was made more dignified and less flashy and sentimental than it usually appears. M. Josef Lhevinne's pianoforte-playing contributed to this flattery of the music. It was broad, majestic, full of proud spirit, and of course a fine specimen of technical power. Weber's 'Der Freischütz' Overture and Beethoven's fifth Symphony completed the programme.

At the concert on June 2, Herr Mengelberg gave us his reading of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, in which he employed all his individuality, his sense of climax, and his art of bringing out musical design. The ably-written Pianoforte concerto by Mr. Haydn Wood (produced at a recent Patron's Fund Concert) was played with skill and enthusiasm by Miss Tina Lerner. The 'Meistersinger' Overture and a Concerto Grosso of Handel added further to the enjoyment of the evening.

On June 9 we had the privilege of one of those choral incursions from Yorkshire that periodically remind us of our deficiencies in the South. The Leeds Philharmonic Chorus co-operated with the Orchestra in the performance of Elgar's 'The Music-Makers' and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The singing in the cantata was highly pointed and shaded, and in this formed a suitable choral background to the high artistry of Miss Muriel Foster as the soloist. The Symphony was given in the manner with which we have become familiar through such occasions, and which needs no description. Herr Nikisch was at his best in the instrumental movements. The solo parts were taken by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

M. Paderewski was doubtless the chief attraction on June 16, when the hall was practically full, but his performance of Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto was not ideal. It lacked spontaneity and charm, and it was dominated by the personality of the exponent at the expense of the music. The concert was made memorable, however, by the splendid interpretation of the 'Eroica' Symphony, given under Herr Nikisch's direction.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

A new Quartet in E minor by Dr. Ethel Smyth was brought forward by the London String Quartet at Bechstein Hall on May 23, and heightened our respect for the composer's virile imagination and resourceful power. The variety and sustained interest of the ideas and the skill of their working-out were remarkable. The performance was excellent.

Mr. James Friskin's Pianoforte quintet in C minor, Op. 1, was played by the Wessely String Quartet at Bechstein Hall on May 24, with Miss Katherine Goodson as pianist.

Smetana's Pianoforte trio in G minor, a work that is well worth an occasional hearing, was played with their accustomed spirit by the London Trio (Mr. Louis Pecskaï, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, and Madame Amina Goodwin) at Æolian Hall on June 4.

Ravel's ever-welcome Quartet in F was played admirably by the English String Quartet at Bechstein Hall on June 11. Mozart's Quartet in G minor and Schumann's in A major made up a well-chosen and a well-performed programme. At the second concert given by these players, which took place on June 18, a new String sextet by Mr. Frank Bridge (the viola player of the Quartet) was produced with the co-operation of Mr. Ernest Tomlinson (second viola) and Mr. Felix Salmond (second violoncello). It is a ripe, thoughtful, and effective work, full of inventiveness and skilful writing.

Signor Tamini, the robust tenor, showed a considerable improvement of style at Queen's Hall, on May 21. He sang 'Rachele, allor che iddio,' from Halévy's 'L'Ebreu,' and the love-song of Siegmund from 'Die Walküre,' with some distinction. The accompaniments were played by the London Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Signor Tullio Serafin, who also conducted spirited performances of Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and other works. A 'Nocturne' by Martucci was heard for the first time in England.

The Wagner Centenary Concert on May 22, coming as an anti-climax to the Covent Garden celebrations, did not enthuse the Albert Hall, but the audience was large and enthusiasm ran high. A long programme of the familiar Wagner-night type was given by the London Symphony Orchestra, inspired to its best efforts by Herr Mengelberg's admirable conducting. Mr. John Coates sang the 'Preislied' from 'Die Meistersinger' and the two forging-songs from 'Siegfried.' During the interval Mr. Louis N. Parker delivered an address.

An excellent impression was made by the compositions of Mr. Percy Sherwood that were heard at Steinway Hall on May 22, when he and Mr. Hans Neumann (violinist) gave a concert. His Pianoforte trio in F sharp minor, played by the concert-givers and Mr. Percy Such (violinist), revealed considerable individuality of manner and a useful technique. A Barcarolle for pianoforte, and several songs given by Mr. Joseph Ireland, were also in the programme. Mr. Sherwood is a professor at the Dresden Conservatoire of Music.

Miss Isolda Menges again played with rare skill and beauty of expression at Queen's Hall on May 23, when she gave a concert with the London Symphony Orchestra under Herr Mengelberg. Many passages in Brahms's Violin concerto were interpreted to absolute perfection.

The fertile, but scarcely deep, imagination of Mr. Henry Hadley, the American composer, has found vent in a number of orchestral works, some of which were introduced to London on May 23, at Queen's Hall. The largest of these was a symphony, 'The seasons,' in four indeterminate, but often poetic and picturesque movements. Other new works were an overture, 'In Bohemia,' and a Symphonic Fantasia in E flat. The London Symphony Orchestra played, and Mr. Hadley conducted. Miss Tina Lerner played Grieg's Pianoforte concerto admirably.

Mr. Wladimir Rozing, a tenor from Russia, showed outstanding powers at the Albert Hall on Sunday, May 25. Mr. Mischa Elman and Miss Alice Verlet appeared at the same concert.

Another of their unequalled Trio concerts was given by MM. Thibaud, Casals, and Bauer at Queen's Hall on May 26. The programme consisted of the Trios of Brahms in C minor (Op. 101), Saint-Saëns in F major (Op. 18), and Tchaikovsky in A minor.

The cult of the Madrigal is not widespread in London, but there are corners where that hardy plant flourishes. One is tended by the Oriana Madrigal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott. On May 27 a concert, in which 'madrigals, ayres, roundes,' &c., played the chief part, was given by this organization at Westminster Cathedral Hall. Ellis Gibbons's 'Long live fair Oriana,' Pilkington's 'The messenger of the delightful Spring,' di Lasso's 'O let me look on thee,' and 'Matona, lovely maiden' were among the many delightful specimens of the old school that were presented, and modern choral writing was represented by Parry's 'Come, pretty wag, and sing' and 'How sweet the answer,' Elgar's 'Evening scene' and 'Weary wind of the West,' and other examples. The singing was characterized by its excellence of tone, its unity, and expressive power.

The 'Prize' Symphony of Richard Wuerst was made the chief feature in the programme of the concert given at Queen's Hall on May 28 by the Royal Engineers' String Band under the direction of Mr. Neville Flux.

The concerts of the Folk-song Quartet are always interesting and refreshing. That given at Æolian Hall on May 29 was additionally so on account of five new works by Dr. Walford Davies that were given for the first time. The carols 'The seven virgins' (unaccompanied) and 'Magdalen at Michael's gate' admirably displayed his fancifulness and ingenuity of idea and his peculiar aptitude for expressing religious faith in simple and almost light musical terms. The other pieces were 'Come live with me,' 'Come, my children,' and 'Love's tranquillity.' Interesting Preludes by Debussy, some from the recently-issued 'second book,' were played with fascinating effect by Dr. Ernest Walker.

Dr. Plewka-Plewczynski's Oratorium Symphonium 'Res Ultima Quattuor,' heard under his direction at Queen's Hall on May 30, proved to be such simple-minded music that it is difficult to consider it in relation to its text. Its invention was fluent, as also was the composer's use of prolonged melodic sequences. The exponents were the Smallwood-Metcalf Choir, Madame d'Onyszkiewicz, Mr. Frederick Blamey, Mr. Humphrey Bishop, and the London Symphony Orchestra.

A delightful programme of French chansons, and of songs by French composers, was given by M. Gustave Ferrari at Bechstein Hall on June 3. The artists were Mr. Gordon Cleather and a small and clever company of lady vocalists, who sang in costume. The modern compositions included 'Le jet d'eau,' for solo and choir, by Charpentier. M. Louis Fleury, M. Albert Cazabon, and M. Ferrari played an Andante and Scherzo for flute by Henri Rabaud.

Renewed admiration for the playing of the South Hampstead Orchestra and for the high ability of Mrs. Julian Marshall as an instructor and director of orchestral forces was felt at Queen's Hall on June 3, when this organization gave an interesting concert. The performance of Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony gave full effect to its beauty and freshness, and an excellent account was given of Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture and Tchaikovsky's Violin concerto, in which Herr Kreisler was soloist.

'Cleopatra,' a one-act opera by Mr. Julius Harrison, was produced by Miss Florence von Etlinger's School of Opera, at 60, Paddington Street, on June 4.

The third and last of the Song and Sonata Recitals given by Mrs. George Swinton (vocalist), Mr. Paul Kochanski (violinist), and Mr. Hamilton Harty (pianist), took place at Bechstein Hall on June 10. The Sonatas were that of Brahms in A and the 'Kreutzer' of Beethoven. The songs included Lieder and Mr. Harty's 'By the bivouac's fitful flame' (Whitman). As before, everything was admirably performed.

An interesting concert of the Beecham Orchestra at Queen's Hall on June 13 served as the début of Miss Florence Macbeth, who succeeded in justifying an advance reputation as a coloratura singer of exceptional gifts. In Delibes's 'Bell song' she displayed astonishing ease of vocalisation and attractive purity of voice. The orchestra, under Mr. Beecham's direction, played Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Antar' Suite, Stanford's seventh Symphony (which it was pleasant to hear again), and Debussy's 'Printemps.'

Songs by Ivor Novello occupied a considerable share of the programme of a miscellaneous concert given by Madame Clara Novello Davies at Æolian Hall on June 13.

STUDENT CONCERTS.

It speaks well for the scope and efficacy of the teaching at the Royal College of Music that Debussy's G minor Quartet was not only admitted into the programme of the Chamber Concert on June 5, but played with ready skill by four students. Brahms's C minor Pianoforte trio was also included, and good selections of solo music were given by Miss Ruby Shepherd, Miss Alice Gear, Miss Dora Horner (vocalists), Mr. Geoffrey Leeds (organist), and Mr. Harold Muslin (violinellist).

The terminal orchestral concert of the Royal Academy of Music took place at Queen's Hall on June 17, under the direction of Sir Alexander Mackenzie. Considerable inventiveness and skill in orchestration were displayed in Mr. Eric Grant's 'Scherzo,' the only novelty in the programme. The soloists who appeared were Miss Harriet Cohen, a clever young pianist, Miss Katherine Dyer, Miss Ivy Holt, Miss Clara Jones, and Mr. Powell Edwards (vocalists), Miss Edith Abraham (violinist), Mr. Horace Perry (organist), and Miss Gwladys G. Lemon (pianist.)

Suburban Concerts.

The string orchestra of the Croydon Conservatoire of Music gave a concert in the large Public Hall on June 13, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Reed. The programme included three pieces by Henry Purcell, Handel’s Concerto for strings in G minor, Ole Olsen’s ‘Petite Suite’ for pianoforte and strings (the solo part being played by Miss J. M. Hennings), and three movements from Dvorák’s Serenade in E, Op. 22. Solos were contributed by various students, and Miss Grace Humphrey acted as accompanist.

St. Chad’s (Haggerston) Choral Society gave an interesting concert at St. Margaret’s Institute, Leytonstone, on June 5. Dunhill’s ‘Tubal Cain’ was the chief choral number in a programme that included Fanning’s ‘The miller’s wooing,’ ‘Song of the Vikings,’ and ‘Moonlight,’ Lee Williams’s ‘Song of the Pedlar,’ and de Pearsall’s ‘When Allen-a-Dale went a-hunting.’ A number of soloists assisted, and the conductor was Mr. James W. Coleman.

The programme of the choral concert given at City of London College on June 5 consisted of a selection from ‘St. Paul,’ Dr. Charles Harris’s ‘Pan,’ and miscellaneous numbers. Excellent results were secured under Mr. G. Day-Winter’s conductorship. The principals were Miss Eva Day-Winter, Miss Gladys Day-Winter, Mr. Holden Heywood, and Mr. Walter Rose.

The St. John’s Choral Society terminated its season on May 23, with a praiseworthy performance of Coleridge-Taylor’s ‘A tale of Old Japan,’ under the direction of Mr. Harold Jenner. The choral portions were attractively sung, and good work was done by the soloists, Madame Gertrude Henshaw, Miss Palgrave Turner, Mr. George Brierley, and Mr. Frederick Nowell. A miscellaneous programme followed.

BIRMINGHAM.

The ninth annual series of the Theatre Royal Promenade Concerts, which were inaugurated on June 2 and concluded June 21, helped to prolong our local musical season. These excellent and most interesting orchestral concerts are carried on as hitherto under the direction of Mr. Max Mossel, the conductor being Mr. Landon Ronald. The orchestra of about sixty-five performers is the best equipped yet heard at the promenades, and is principally composed of local professional players, augmented by a contingent of Dutch instrumentalists from the orchestras of Amsterdam and The Hague, the leader being Mr. T. H. Smith, an excellent local violinist, and the accompanist Mr. G. H. Manton. The new works introduced were few and not very important; on the other hand we had again excellent performances of Elgar’s second Symphony and the ‘Enigma’ Variations, never heard here under better conditions. Among the principal artists were many new-comers, whose efforts were greatly appreciated. The list comprised Mesdames Ada Forrest, Elizabeth Munthe-Kaas, Dora Gibson, Rosina Buckman, Bettina Freeman, Leah Felissa, Lillian Stiles-Allen, Violet Oppenshaw, Messrs. Charles Mott, George Baker, Sidney Stoddard, and Reginald Herbert (vocalists); Miss Irene Scharer, Miss Myrtle Meggy, Messrs. Egon Petri, Theodore Szanto, and Percy Grainger (pianists); Miss Daisy Kennedy, Miss Ilse Veda Duttlinger, Messrs. Daniel Melsa, Adolf Metz; and Max Mossel (violinists), Mr. Boris Hambourg and Mr. W. H. Squire (violinists).

Our veteran musician Mr. W. C. Stockley has just issued, in book form, an interesting account of his life in Birmingham, under the title ‘Fifty years of music in Birmingham.’ A detailed account is given of all the works he conducted both in connection with the Festival Choral Society and his own orchestral concerts. He came to Birmingham as early as 1849, and in 1856 was appointed conductor of the Festival Choral Society as successor to Mr. Stimpson, severing his connection with this Society in 1895. His first orchestral concert he held in the Town Hall, December 11, 1873, and his last, March 11, 1897.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The summer season has opened with considerable éclat and with little abatement of the high-pressure that characterized the winter series of concerts. But the two seasons, despite a certain resemblance, have their points of dissimilarity; for whereas orchestral music largely predominates during the winter months, the present season, on the other hand, brings us a bigger proportion of miscellaneous concerts. These latter, therefore, have first claim upon our notice.

On May 19 those two sterling artists, Kreisler and Backhaus, gave a joint recital which was highly appreciated, albeit the programme was hardly of that commanding interest that would best harmonize with the lofty ideals and uncommon talents of the performers. A few days later a concert was given by Madame Liza Lehmann, Miss Nancy Price, Miss Kathleen Peck, and Mr. Powell Edwards; and on May 31 a recital on somewhat analogous lines to the foregoing was given by Mr. Julius Walther, with whom were associated some lesser-known artists. Much interest was aroused by the announcement of a visit on June 5 from that strongly temperamental violinist, Mr. Mischa Elman, whose playing is so generally admired for its ardent warmth. Another young player, Melsa, who furnishes evidence that in due time he will achieve greatness, was heard to manifest advantage on June 13, when, in conjunction with the orchestra, he played Bach’s magnificent Violin concerto in E major with delicious assurance; his performance of the familiar Max Bruch Concerto in G minor unexpectedly revealed a few signs of immaturity.

When all is said and done, however, the outstanding event of the month was the Wagner Centenary Concert, which took place on the evening of June 10. Mr. Dan Godfrey, with the valuable assistance of Miss Carrie Tubb,

Mr. Frank Foster, and Mr. Thorpe Bates, was enabled to present an unusually fine and enterprising programme, and in the result it proved to be the most successful feature of the current season, so far as this has gone. The entire third scene from the third Act of 'Die Walküre' came as a complete novelty to a Bournemouth audience, and the real magnificence of the orchestral playing—the excellences of which were by no means restricted to this extract alone—coupled with the solid worth of the singing, afforded ample excuses for the unrestrained enthusiasm which the splendid performance evoked. Reference must not be omitted to one of the factors in the success of the concert, namely, the clever programme notes from the pen of that unequalled authority upon matters Wagnerian, Mr. W. Ashton Ellis. Altogether it was an event which will long be remembered in the town.

The summer series of symphony concerts once more pursue the even tenor of their way, and if allowance is made for the fact that the programmes are avowedly popular (in the best sense of the word) and, to a certain extent, unambitious in scope, still there has been much to listen to of a thoroughly enjoyable nature. At one of the concerts Wagner's lovely 'Siegfried Idyll' was played under similar conditions to those at its first performance, that is to say, with an orchestra of seventeen performers—an experiment which was certainly justified by the charm of the result. The instrumental soloists, who, in accordance with the custom at these concerts, are drawn from the orchestral ranks, have performed with marked ability, the following being the names of those who have appeared:—Mr. Montague Birch (Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillant for pianoforte and orchestra), Mr. F. King-Hall (two movements from Vieuxtemps's Violin concerto No. 4), Mr. Albert Smit (a Violoncello concerto by De Swert), and Mr. Jean Gennin (Concertstück for flute and orchestra by Hofmann). Vocal relief has been supplied by Mr. Arthur Strugnell and Miss Nora Read.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Nothing of particular interest claims attention in the Three Towns in a review of the musical life of the past month. The summer season of outdoor entertainment has been inaugurated on the usual standard. Military band performances on the Hoe Promenade—and, if precedent be followed, in the public parks—will engage the resident Army and Navy bands; concerts are given daily in the Pier Pavilion, with weekly band performances. Otherwise musical enterprise is sleeping, and only festival services in the churches carry on the tale in any degree.

The Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir entered the lists at the Bristol Competitive Festival on May 19, and not only won the first prize against two other competing choirs, but were accorded the highest praise by the adjudicator, Dr. Walford Davies. One of the test-pieces, 'A song of the bard,' by Julius Harrison, could only be described as outré and exceptionally difficult, but in intonation and accuracy the Plymouth singers, conducted by Mr. David Parkes, were perfect. They gave a beautiful performance of each piece, and are to be encouraged to further efforts.

DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

The hard-working and high-purposed members of Exmouth Choral Society, led by their hon. conductor, Mr. Raymond Wilmot, sang the 'Hiawatha' trilogy on March 21, assisted by a small band. The choral singing was of beautiful quality, expression and technique both receiving good attention. The principals were Miss Nina Pine Coffin, Mr. Roland Huyshe, and Mr. Walter Belgrave; Miss Ruby Davy led the band.

Crediton Musical Society performed 'The Messiah,' on May 22, conducted by Mr. N. J. Byng Johnson. The choruses were admirably sung, and the soloists were Miss Edith Trew, Miss Amy Holman, Mr. J. Dean Trotter, and Mr. Herbert Tracey. Mr. A. R. Trevithick, of Exeter, presided at the organ.

The Isca Glee Singers (Messrs. W. J. Cotton, A. G. Wills, W. F. Crabb, and W. J. Belgrave) sang at the Ladies' Evening of the Exeter Constitutional Harmonic Society, on May 23. Others who contributed were the Misses R. Trippie and W. Tanner, and Mr. Charles Harvey (songs), Mr. W. E. Mead (violin solos), and Mr. Frank Kerley (at the pianoforte).

On June 11 Mr. de Blois Rowe produced, at Tavistock, his new comic opera 'A Mad Night, or the Nürnberg Doll.' This was the second opera brought out by Mr. Rowe in his native town, and it marked a distinct advance in the standard of the music and general scheme. The first Act was the most important musically, and in the last Act was a beautiful song for the (only) female part. This was sung with good effect by Miss Mary Groser, who sustained the part excellently throughout. The other characters were taken by Mr. T. F. Dunstan, Mr. T. M. Beer, and Mr. S. C. Pearce. A small band assisted, led by Mr. de Blois Rowe at the pianoforte. The chorus, who had unusually little to do, did that little well.

In the Torquay Pavilion, on June 12, Mr. Ernest Goss gave a violin, pianoforte, and song recital, in which assistance was given by Miss Ruby Davy (violin), Miss Eileen Buck, and Mr. George Baker. In the evening of the same day the performers gave a ballad concert, at which Miss Gladys Moger also sang.

The twenty-seventh Festival of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association, of which Mr. T. Roylands-Smith is the hon. conductor, on June 10, was the most successful event of the kind which has been achieved for many years. In the three-years' rota, the Archdeacons of Torne and Exeter were invited to join the Cathedral Choir, and thirty-seven parish choirs responded. The total number of singers was 1,000, with the large proportion of over seven hundred in the processional division. For the first time in the experience of the Association the honorary organist, Dr. D. J. Wood, was absent, and the cause of his absence—ill-health—evoked expressions of sincere regret. His deputy, Mr. F. J. Pinn, by his essentially ecclesiastical style and capable, solid, steady playing, greatly added to the unanimity and reverence of the service. The setting of the canticles was Hopkins in D, in which the fine Gloria was splendidly sung; the anthem was Wesley's 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel,' and chants for the special psalms were by Dr. Alan Grey, Sir Hubert Parry, and Sir Walter Parratt. The Te Deum was sung to Walmisley in C. In the standard of preparation evident, in reverence, and in the quality of the singing, the Festival recorded high-water mark.

CORNWALL.

In her native town, St. Austell, Miss Maria Yelland, the Cornish contralto, gave a concert in aid of the fund of the St. Austell Co., D.C.L.I., T.F., and received a cordial welcome, to which she responded by singing several songs charmingly. Other contributors were Miss Mary Groser, Mr. Fernley Pope, Mr. Sydney Fairman, Miss Mary Hawke (elocutionist), Mr. Wilson Manhire (accompanist), and St. Austell Band.

In aid of local charities, Launceston Amateur Operatic and Dramatic Society performed 'The Pirates of Penzance,' on May 22, conducted by Mr. E. Tregoning. The choruses were effectively sung, and the principals were capable.

Two Festivals have been held up to date in the Truro Diocese in affiliation with the Diocesan Association. Seven choirs took part in the service at Bodmin, on June 4—Bodmin, Cardynham, Egloskayle, Lanivet, Lostwithiel, Luxulyan, and St. Winnow. The canticles were sung to a setting by Brewer; and the anthem was 'Ascribe unto the Lord,' by Hugh Blair. The Rev. C. F. Jones conducted, and Mr. R. R. Glendinning was the organist. St. Austell Kuridecanal Choral Union held its Festival on June 5 at St. Paul's Church, Charlestown. Thirteen choirs assembled from St. Austell, Charlestown, Fowey, St. Mewan, Sticker, Treverbyn, St. Stephen's, Mevagissey, Caerhayes, St. Erme, Gorran, Pentewan, and Porthpean, producing a total of 275 voices. Mr. W. Clemon was the organist, and Mr. W. Brennan Smith conducted. The music was that of the Diocesan Service Book for the year, as at Bodmin. Especially good was the singing of the hymns (particularly the processional, 'O faith of England') and the psalms.

DUBLIN.

On May 29 the College Choral Society gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' in its entirety. The concert opened with Chopin's Funeral March, played by the orchestra in memory of the late Lord Ashbourne (formerly Lord Chancellor of Ireland and a patron of the Society). Madame Borel, Mr. William Lewin, and Mr. T. W. Hall were the soloists. Dr. Charles Marchant conducted.

The Sunday Orchestral Concerts at Woodbrook came to an end for the present season with the concert on June 1, when the programme included Beethoven's seventh Symphony and Dr. Esposito's second Irish Rhapsody for violin and orchestra (with Signor Simonetti as soloist). Mr. Arthur MacCallum was the vocalist. On May 25 the chief item on the programme was Schumann's 'Andante and Variations' for two pianofortes, beautifully played by Miss Fanny Davies and Dr. Esposito. Miss Davies also played a group of short pieces by Scarlatti, Brahms, and Liszt. The Symphony was that of Haydn, in B flat.

LIVERPOOL.

To the names of next season's 'guest-conductors,' with whom definite arrangements have been made by the Philharmonic Society, are to be added Mr. Max Fiedler and Mr. Hamilton Harty. Elgar's 'Caractacus' has also been selected for performance as well as the 'Messiah.' Sir Frederic Cowen will conduct both works, which will have the advantage of being chorally prepared by Mr. Harry Evans. Composed for the Leeds Festival of 1898, it is strange that so long an interval should elapse before the first performance of Elgar's 'Caractacus' at Liverpool. In this belated recognition of the merits of an interesting and attractive work, the Philharmonic Society have made a wise choice, for 'Caractacus' is a quasi-novelty which will at once commend itself and subsequently occasion no acrimonious discussion in the daily press. One of the choral novelties selected to be produced at the ensuing Leeds Festival in October, is Mr. Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter.'

At the annual general meeting of the Welsh Choral Union it was stated that in view of exceptional circumstances, the result of the past year was considered satisfactory. The total receipts for the season (including £105 brought forward) were £1,496, while the expenditure was £1,424, leaving a credit balance of £72 at the close of the season. The experiment of giving two performances (afternoon and evening) of the 'Messiah' had resulted in a loss of £50 by the afternoon performance. The receipts for the last two concerts of the season had not fulfilled the committee's expectations. Musically the season was an unqualified success, and the choir had more than upheld its reputation. The season was the most strenuous yet experienced, and had entailed heavy extra work, for in addition to its own programmes at home, the choir sang Bantock's 'Atalanta' Choral Symphony at Manchester and at Birmingham. Special thanks were due to Mr. Harry Evans for his untiring devotion, to Madame Maggie Evans (accompanist), and the members of the choir. Congratulations were offered to Mr. Evans on his appointment as resident choral conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, and also as Director of Music at the University College of North Wales.

In replying on behalf of himself and his colleagues, Mr. Harry Evans said there were not many Societies which, after eleven years' existence, could show such a record as the Welsh Choral Union. That result could never have been attained but for the enthusiasm and faith of the singing members of the Society and splendid support of the committee. The programme of next season would include two parts of 'Hiawatha' in honour of the memory of the late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, and a new choral work, 'Vanity of Vanities,' which Mr. Granville Bantock was dedicating to the Welsh Choral Union. At the last concert Brahms's 'Requiem' would be given, a work in which the choir would be heard at its best. In conclusion, Mr. Harry Evans stated, amid applause, that any appointments which might happen to come his way would never be allowed to interfere with his connection with the Welsh Choral Union. The president (Mr. Robert-Roberts), the treasurer (Mr. J. D. Jones), and the secretary (Mr. Llewellyn Wynne) were re-elected.

Although music is not avowedly one of the objects of the Exhibition which is now being held at Liverpool, it is certain that at the present time, when the affair has not yet reached full swing, the al fresco band concerts are the chief attraction. During recent weeks one of the most successful engagements was that of the Berlin Wind Instrument Orchestra, conducted by Herr Fritz von Blon. This large combination of brass and wood-wind has a wide and varied repertoire, and the performance of symphonic music, as well as of familiar Wagner, Tchaikovsky, and Liszt pieces, was especially good. The closing performances on June 14 attracted great concourses of people, and the band president, Herr Donath, expressed in excellent English and in warm tones the thanks of himself and colleagues for the kindness of their reception, which was an evidence of the German entente cordiale now happily existing.

The visit to Liverpool of their Majesties The King and Queen, on July 11 and 13, is occasioning a great amount of preparation in many directions. At the new Gladstone Dock, the Mersey Board have constructed a timbered stand for the 1,000 chorists and band of H.M. Irish Guards, which appears to be equal in elemental strength and simplicity to the immutable granite walls of the dock itself. No thunders, whether vocal or instrumental, could possibly shake its grim stability. Their Majesties will hear the choir and band from the other side of the dock, a distance of 155 feet, so that a series of signals has been devised by the resourceful Mr. Ralph Baker, in order to ensure prompt choral responses to the Lord Bishop's benedictory prayers. The Cathedral organist, Mr. F. H. Burstall, will here be conductor-in-chief.

At St. George's Hall, where the organ is now being overhauled, Mr. Branscombe will be in charge of the choir of 100 picked voices from the Philharmonic Society's chorus, and in the neighbouring borough of Bootle, Mr. A. E. Workman will conduct a choir of 8,000 school children, for whom three bands will be provided, in the National Anthem. There would appear to be some danger of Elgar's 'Land of Hope and Glory' being sung to death. It is apparently the only suitable patriotic chorus the authorities know of.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The report of the Hallé Society on June 2 does not make pleasant reading. The loss on twenty Manchester concerts was £400, and twenty concerts in various other centres showed a deficit of £316; but this debit balance had been reduced to £572, necessitating a call of £3 per guarantor. The appeal to the public for special funds and to the guarantors to pay up the balance of their guarantee had together resulted in fifty-four persons promising at once, or in instalments, an aggregate of £1,952. Of this, £1,340 has been invested, yielding £55 per annum, not enough to pay for one extra rehearsal. The net proceeds of the Annual Pension Fund Concert were £161. For the coming winter, arrangements have been completed whereby the bulk of the players are engaged on weekly terms instead of per engagement, provision being made for fifty concerts and twenty extra rehearsals in addition to the customary one on the day of the concert.

Arrangements have been made for another Scotch tour next spring; so much were the executive impressed with the character of the Edinburgh and Glasgow press criticisms of the Beethoven Festival Concerts in Edinburgh last March, that they have taken the unusual course of printing these in brochure form and sending a copy to all subscribers! Can it be that they think Balling and his men are not appreciated at their true worth in Manchester, and that we must have it knocked into our heads that Edinburgh and Glasgow critics are under no delusions on this point? The executive's action would have been more comprehensible had there been anything of a distinctive character about these critiques.

As to next season, Mr. E. J. Broadfield announced a repetition of the 'Parsifal' evening, Verdi's 'Requiem' in honour of his centenary (a work not heard in Manchester for the past twenty-five years), Brahms's 'Schicksalslied,' and Walford Davies's 'Song of St. Francis' (his setting of 'Everyman' still awaits its initial performance here on an adequate scale). Mr. R. H. Wilson, too, is believed to be desirous of singing 'Atalanta in Calydon' again, but nothing definite is known on this head; one wonders whether Bantock's new choral work in four or five movements, called 'The Vanity of Vanities' will be considered as a 'possible'; on February 14 Mr. Harry Evans is to do it in Liverpool.

The orchestral novelties already arranged include Max Reger's 'Concerto in the ancient style'; Sinigaglia's 'La Baruffe Chiozzotte'; Strauss's 'Aus Italien' and Holbrook's 'Queen Mab' Scherzo (both legacies from last season); Rachmaninoff's Pianoforte concerto, to be played by the composer; Bantock's 'Helena F. B.' Variations, and a Bruckner Symphony. Besides Rachmaninoff, we are to hear Siloti, Cortot, and Irene Scharrer, Isolde Mehges, Brodsky, and numerous vocalists.

In recent years various attempts have been made, without success, to bring home to the executive the necessity of introducing fresh blood into that body. The executive is elected by, and from among, the guarantors of £100 (who may not in every case be subscribers) instead of from the main body of subscribers; as a consequence the executive can only be drawn from a restricted area, and conceivably the ablest persons for such duties may find themselves disqualified by inability to assume guarantee. Until this year a deaf ear has been turned to all such requests. By June 2 the executive admitted that the idea was receiving consideration; pressed for a less vague reply the chairman hinted that such a course would almost certainly be taken 'at the next meeting' (presumably in June, 1914). Bishop Welldon, who has been most persistent on this point of more democratic control, on receiving the reply just indicated promptly suggested the names of Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne and Mr. S. H. Nicholson (past and present organists at the Cathedral here), which produced the rejoinder that neither were guarantors, and even if they had been there were enough specialists already on the executive.

To an outside observer it would seem that the most pressing need is the choice of one or two men of acknowledged business capacity, who to such qualities unite keen musicianship, a wide outlook on the world of music, sound ideas, catholicity of taste, and whose artistic judgment can be relied upon by the conductor as his own. Men of this type have always been found in movements achieving great ends. Liverpool formerly possessed such men in the late Alfred E. Rodewald and Mr. J. Dudley Johnston (now removed to London). Men like these are frequently better posted on current musical matters than professional musicians, simply because their passion for music leads them to take a more live interest in things—they are amateurs in the fundamental sense of the word; and once you are sure of their unflinching fidelity to root principles, a couple of persons of this type on an executive are worth half-a-dozen professional musicians.

A writer in the Manchester Courier recently said, with truth: 'A striking act of supreme intelligence might cancel the past in an instant. Courage, a high sense of adventure, willingness to face a strenuous period of criticism, mostly adverse and mostly from a generation out of touch with the flow of things musical—these are needed in order to tackle the problem of how to fill empty seats without abating artistic ideals.'

On Saturday, June 21, ten or twelve hundred choristers assembled under Mr. Nicholson at the Cathedral for the Diocesan Festival, their large numbers leaving little room for the congregation. Wesley's 'Ascribe unto the Lord,' Brahms's 'Requiem' chorus 'How lovely are Thy dwellings,' and Bach's 'Come, ye thankful' (from the 'Christmas Oratorio'), with Smart's 'Magnificat,' constituted the Festival work.

The girl-operatives of Miss Say Ashworth's Ancients Institute Choir leave Manchester on August 4 en route (via Folkestone and Boulogne) for Zurich, where, in the Tonhalle, in conjunction with the orchestra, two concerts are to be given by them on August 6 and 7; thence they proceed to Lucerne, with appearances at the Kursaal. Here they are to remain several days to have, as their generous conductor hopes, 'the best time they ever had in their lives.'

The Manchester celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Kaiser's accession to the throne took place on June 13 in a befitting manner. Between the German Consul and the members of Mr. W. S. Nesbitt's Orpheus Choir there exists a bond of real fellowship born of a recognition of the Choir's supreme artistic qualities, and celebrations of German national occasions usually find the Choir singing for the Kaiser and Consul with heart and voice (this time in German!). On his return from Frankfurt in May, Captain Schlagentweit brought back Hégar's new work '1813' (commemorative of the Napoleonic débâcle of a hundred years ago) for the Orpheus men to study. The festivities on June 13 were inaugurated by Mr. Nesbitt's men singing Adolf Frey's rousing lines, and one wondered how they would have fared with this piece in the huge competition at Frankfurt on May 4. After the banquet they also sang in German Strauss's 'Liebe' and 'Brautentanz' and Brahms's 'Wiegenlied'; later in the evening the Consul's daughter and Felix Fleischer (from Bremen, but now with Carl Rosa) repeated Wolf Ferrari's 'Susannens Geheimnis,' produced by them here on the occasion of the Kaiser's Birthday Banquet in 1912.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The only event of importance during the month has been the recital of modern song given by Mr. Frank Mullings, at the June meeting of the Northern Section of the I.S.M. Four groups of songs were chosen from the works of Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, Granville Bantock ('Férishtah's fancies') and Roger Quilter (Shakespeare songs) respectively. Mr. Mullings sang with rare ability and insight, and Mr. W. G. Whitaker accompanied. Mr. T. Henderson, hon. secretary of the Northern Section contributed explanatory notes on the songs, devoting particular attention to those of Prof. Bantock.

OXFORD.

On May 3, a delightful pianoforte recital was given in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall by Mr. Harold Bauer, the principal items being Bach's 'Italian' Concerto and Beethoven's Sonata in F major, Op. 78.

On May 10, in the Town Hall, a complimentary concert was given for the benefit of Mrs. Sunman (widow of the late Mr. Henry Sunman, for many years a member of the Cathedral choir), at which nearly £60 was realised. The combined lay-clerks of the various Colleges are to be sincerely congratulated on an excellent concert.

The first 'Eights-week' concert was given by Balliol on May 18, when amongst other items the Ackroyd Siring Quartet gave excellent interpretations of Smetana's Quartet in E minor, and Brahms's Quintet in F minor, Op. 34. Two days later a very interesting concert was given by Exeter, the chief item being Stanford's 'Revenge,' which was ably conducted by the organ scholar, Mr. H. S. Price, while songs and part-songs were given in the miscellaneous part.

On May 21 came the Keble concert, at which more than a thousand people enjoyed themselves. A full orchestra was provided, and gave a good account of the Prelude to the third Act of 'Die Meistersinger,' Berlioz's 'Hungarian March,' Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite (Op. 46), and Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, Op. 26. The remaining items were songs and part-songs given under the conductorship of Mr. D. G. A. Fox (organ scholar) and Mr. T. F. Bye. Queen's followed the next day with an interesting programme, consisting of two sets of songs in German, nicely sung by Fräulein Diestel, a few part-songs, and two instrumental Trios for flute, violin, and pianoforte, by Kuhlau and César Cui.

The chief concert of the term, given under the auspices of the Musical Club, took place on May 28, in the Town Hall, when Dr. Allen directed a programme of all-round excellence. It consisted of Beethoven's seventh Symphony, Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations, the 'Tristan' Prelude and Liebestod, César Franck's poem for pianoforte and orchestra, 'Les Djinns,' with Mr. Egon Petri as pianist, and Mr. Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's dance,' which so pleased the audience that the last portion was repeated by way of encore.

On June 10, Sir Walter Parratt, the Professor of Music, gave his usual terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre before a large audience, the subject being 'The full orchestra.' The lecture was most interesting from beginning to end.

The gradual growth of the modern orchestra, said Sir Walter Parratt, was one of the most remarkable examples of the progress of evolution. It had the mildest beginnings, many set-backs and, latterly, feverish exaggerations, from which at the present moment it much suffered. Probably the first musician to grapple with orchestral difficulties successfully was Monteverde; next came Corelli; then, in turn, Handel and Bach, each influenced by the circumstances of the time, and by peculiar and varied surroundings. The lecturer showed how timid the great composers were in introducing new instruments into their works, and incidentally told an amusing anecdote of the gigantic Handel, who was induced to write a part for the serpent in several of his works. At one of his rehearsals the serpent-man very much bungled his part, when Handel, pointing at him, sarcastically said, 'Ah! that was not the serpent which tempted Eve.' Excellent illustrations were given under the baton of Dr. Allen, the Choragus, and the lecture was full of interest and instruction.

JOHANNESBURG.—A festival concert in aid of the Masonic Benevolent Fund took place on May 7. The Johannesburg Choral and Orchestral Societies assisted, under the direction of Mr. F. W. Peters, and gave good performances of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Viking song,' Smart's 'Hunting chorus,' and the 'Soldiers' chorus' from 'Faust.' The orchestra played Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance March,' No. 1, and Sibelius's 'Finlandia.'—The Wagner Centenary was celebrated on May 21 with a festival concert at St. Mary's Parish Hall, given by Mr. W. Deane. The programme of Wagner excerpts was carried out by the Band of the 10th Royal Hussars, Mr. Deane (organist), Miss Blodwen Hopkins, and Mr. H. Tyhurst (vocalists).

LEEDS.—On Wednesday, May 28, the newly-formed North Leeds Church Choirs Association held its first Festival Evensong in St. Aidan's Church. This Association is composed of the choirs of St. Martin's, St. Clement's, St. Edmund's, St. John's (Moor Allerton), St. Matthew's (Chapel-Allerton), St. John's (Roundhay), and St. Aidan's, numbering over two hundred voices. The Canticles were sung to the setting of Smart in F, the anthem being 'O praise the Lord of Heaven' (Goss). Stanford's 'Te Deum in B flat' was sung as a 'Solemn Te Deum' before the Blessing. The singing of the choir was remarkable for its splendid tone and flexibility, whilst in phrasing and expression little was left to be desired. Mr. H. Matthias Turton (organist and choirmaster of St. Aidan's) was the conductor, and had also acted as visiting choirmaster in the preparation of the music. Mr. J. Groves (St. Edmund's) presided at the organ.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

CREDITON.—On Wednesday, May 21, the Crediton Musical Society gave Handel's 'Messiah' in the Parish Church. In this, their first attempt at an oratorio, they exhibited a brightness and precision that would have done credit to many a veteran choral Society. The conductor was Mr. N. F. Byng Johnson. He had also trained the boys of the local Grammar School Choir, who helped in the choruses. The soloists were Miss E. Trew, Miss A. Holman, Mr. J. D. Trotter, and Mr. H. Tracey. A small band, led by Miss Byng Johnson, proved efficient. Mr. A. R. Trevithick was at the organ.

HARROGATE.—The Wagner Centenary was celebrated by two orchestral concerts at the Kursaal under the direction of M. Julian Clifford. Madame Gleeson-White and Mr. Frank Mullings were the soloists, and the programme consisted of an excellent selection of familiar excerpts.

HARTLEPOOL.—The St. George's Choral Society gave, on April 30, as the second concert of their tenth season, Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch' before a large audience. The Society is not a large one, numbering only about fifty-eight voices, but the beautiful and brilliant choruses were performed with a sonority and spirit that would have done credit to a much larger body of voices. The important solo work was admirably sung by Miss Dorothy Foster, Mrs. E. Smith, Mr. Brown (of Durham Cathedral), and Mr. George R. Gibbs. Mr. E. V. Pickersgill and Mr. A. Bowes were at the pianoforte and organ respectively, and Mr. A. J. Smith conducted. The Society subsequently showed their appreciation of their conductor's efforts by presenting him with a specially-bound copy of the 'Martyr,' accompanied by a cheque. The Society has been further successful in winning first-prizes at the West Hartlepool and Saltburn Festivals.

ILKLEY (YORKS).—A chamber concert or quite exceptional interest took place at Ilkley on May 29, when Mr. H. Matthias Turton presented a programme which is probably unique so far as the North of England is concerned. Max Reger's Pianoforte trio in E minor, his Sonata for violin and pianoforte, Op. 72, and Christian Sinding's Pianoforte trio, Op. 64, can safely be said to test the capabilities of the most advanced of performers, and it is to the credit of Mr. Turton and his associates, Mr. W. Burnett Carter (violinist) and Mr. C. Everett Brennand (violinist), that the performance was such as to elicit warm praise from the Press. These three works formed the programme of a concert given at the Church Institute, Leeds, in April, and were (so far as is known) first performances in this part of the country.

LLANELLY.—Fully 2,500 people attended at the Market Hall for the recent performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' by Trion United Choir, under the direction of Mr. D. J. de Lloyd. The choral singing was highly creditable. A small orchestra assisted under the leadership of Mr. W. F. Hulley, and the solo parts were taken by Miss Thomas, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. Harry Davies. As a result of this concert the hospital will benefit to the extent of about £200.

NEVIS (B.W.I.).—On April 24 the Philharmonic Society gave a miscellaneous concert, under the direction of Mr. C. M. Howell. The choir gave a good account of Hatton's 'Softly fall the shades of evening,' and Pinsuti's 'In this hour of softened splendour.'

READING.—The summer concert of the University College Choral Society and Orchestra, which took place on June 4 at the Town Hall, was of exceptional interest, as it provided among other good things a performance of Dr. Ernest Walker's 'A Hymn to Dionysus,' which was given with beautiful effect. Another notable English work performed was Dr. R. Vaughan Williams's 'Five Mystical Songs,' sung by Mr. Thornely Gibson. Bach's 'Be not afraid,' opened the work of the choir, which therefore had undertaken an exacting evening's work. Under Dr. H. P. Allen's guidance the task was well carried out. The programme further included Brahms's Double Concerto for violin and violoncello, played by Mr. Percy Sharman and Miss May Mukle, César Franck's song, 'La Procession,' given by Mr. Thornely Gibson, and Bach's cantata, 'Make a joyful noise unto God,' in which Miss Ruth Freeman gave the solo, and Mr. J. Solomon the trumpet obbligato.

RHYL.—An excellent performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given by the Choral Society at the Pavilion on May 15, under the direction of Mr. Bryan Warhurst. The choral singing was of high quality, and good assistance was given by Mr. Philip Lewis's orchestra, led by Mr. Horace Haselden. The soloists were Madame Aston, Miss Effie Martyn, Señor José de Moraes, and Mr. Powell Edwards.

ROCKDALE (SYDNEY).—The first performance in this district of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given on April 24 by the St. George Choral Union. Under the direction of Mr. H. A. Jacques the choral portions were sung with excellent confidence and finish. The solo parts were taken by Miss Mabel Batchelor, Miss Dorrie Ward, Mr. J. G. Vail, and Mr. A. K. Jamieson, and an excellent orchestra accompanied.

VANCOUVER (B.C.).—A highly successful season has just been brought to a close by the Vancouver Musical Society. The concert given on April 29 consisted of the performance of Sullivan's 'Festival Te Deum,' followed by a miscellaneous programme of glees, madrigals, &c. The choir was efficiently assisted by the orchestra of the Society, singers and instrumentalists numbering altogether close on two hundred performers. A feature of this Association is the large proportion of members hailing from various parts of the British Isles, so that the Vancouver Musical Society may lay some small claim to being another of our 'links of Empire.' The works selected for next season are the 'Messiah' and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' both to be given with full orchestral accompaniment.

AMSTERDAM.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the Concertgebouw Orchestra was celebrated with a three days' musical festival under Herr Mengelberg's direction. The programmes included Mahler's 'Das Lied von der Erde' and eighth Symphony, and works of Beethoven.

ANTWERP.

Peter Benoit's choral works 'Noël' and 'Alma Redemptoris,' a Concert-overture by E. Wambach, an 'Elegie' by Sokolow and a 'Hamlet' Overture by Stadtfeldt figured in the programme of the last Conservatoire concert (conductor, M. E. Wambach).—The Wagner centenary was celebrated with two special concerts given on May 26 and 28 under the direction of M. Frank von der Stucken. Fragments from 'Rienzi' to 'Parsifal' formed the programmes. Some of the best known Wagnerian singers took part.

BASEL.

Gluck's 'Iphigenia auf Tauris,' in Richard Strauss's version, was recently given at the Municipal Theatre.—Among the works recently performed at the chamber music concerts of the Allgemeine Musikgesellschaft were Verdi's String quartet in E minor, Mozart's Quintet for violin, two violas, horn, and violoncello, a new String quartet by K. H. David, and a new Violin sonata, 'Quasi Fantasia,' by Dr. Hans Huber.—Choral works by Schubert, including 'Gesang der Geister über den Wassern,' 'Widerspruch,' 'Wehmut,' 'Grab und Mond,' 'Ständchen' (with contralto solo), 'Im Gegenwärtigen Vergangenes' (with tenor solo), and 'Nachtgesang im Walde' were heard at the last concert of the Baseler Liedertafel (conductor, Dr. Hermann Suter).

BAYREUTH.

The freedom of the town was recently bestowed on Dr. Hans Richter and Herr Siegfried Wagner.

BERLIN.

A new 'Kammersymphonie' by Arnold Schönberg for fifteen solo instruments was recently produced, being played twice at the same concert. It seems to have had the usual effect of Schönberg's works upon the audience. One critic calls it a 'Chamber of Horrors Symphony.'—To celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Emperor's accession the musical section of the Königliche Akademie der Künste gave two festival concerts devoted to works composed during the Emperor's reign by members of the Akademie. The scheme included compositions by Brahms, Max Bruch, Humperdinck, Georg Schumann, Richard Strauss, Philipp Scharwenka, E. E. Taubert, Rudorff, and Friedrich Koch.

BORDEAUX.

An opera, 'L'Anneau d'Izel,' composed by M. Gaston Paulin to the libretto by M. Maxime Simmonet, was recently produced at the Grand Théâtre.

BRESLAU.

Count Geza Zichy's three-act Hungarian opera 'Rodosto' was performed for the first time in Germany at the Municipal Theatre.—Under the auspices of the Town Council, a Wagner celebration took place at the same theatre. On this occasion the original version of 'Tannhäuser's Pilgerfahrt' (as published by Messrs. Novello in London, and since by Messrs. Fürstner) was heard for the first time.—Claudio Monteverde's opera 'Orfeo' was given its first modern performance in Germany on June 8. Great trouble had been taken to reconstruct, as far as possible, the original form of the work in regard to the orchestration and to the recitatives, and much interest, not purely of a historic nature, was aroused.

BUENOS AIRES.

The third Act of 'Parsifal' formed part of the programme of a Wagner celebration at the Colon Theatre.

CHICAGO NORTH SHORE FESTIVAL.

The fifth annual Festival of the Chicago North Shore Festival Association at Evanston was opened on May 26 by a magnificent performance of the 'Messiah.' For this occasion the choir was increased to 1,000 singers, and the result fully justified the experiment, as Dean Lutkin had everything under splendid control, and was enabled to produce some effects impossible with a smaller choir. Miss Florence Hinkle, Miss Christine Miller, Mr. Reed Miller, and Mr. Henri Scott were the soloists, and acquitted themselves with great credit. The choruses, 'Since by man came death,' and 'For as in Adam all die,' were admirably sung by the A Cappella Choir of Northwestern University. The accompaniments were furnished by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra (formerly the Theodore Thomas Orchestra). May 2 was 'Artists' Night,' the Chicago Symphony Orchestra (under Frederick Stock) and M. Ysaye furnishing the programme. One of the features of this concert was a 'Theme and variations' composed by Arne Oldberg, one of the faculty of the N.W. University School of Music. It was conducted by the composer, and received with favour by the audience. The 'Children's Crusade,' by Gabriel Pierné, was sung at the third concert by the Festival Choir of 600, assisted by the A Cappella Choir and 500 young ladies from the High Schools of Evanston and the North Shore. The expression and refinement of the singing of this contingent, added to the work of the entire choir and the splendid accompaniments of the orchestra, made the performance noteworthy. Particularly impressive was the 'De Profundis,' 'Blest waters, blue sea' was sung with a pianissimo effect rarely attained by so large a body. The solo parts were ably sustained by Madame Mabel Sharp Herdier, Madame Edith Chapman Gould, Miss Mary Ann Kaufman, Mr. Paul Althouse, and Mr. Gustaf Holmgren. On Saturday afternoon the children's choir of 1,500 voices sang Rathbone's 'Vogelweid the Minnesinger' and a number of part-songs with fine effect. Miss Helen Stanley proved a very delightful soloist. At the Wagner Anniversary Concert which closed the Festival on Saturday evening, Miss Florence Hinkle, Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Mr. Paul Althouse, Mr. Clarence Whitehill, and Mr. Herbert Miller were the soloists in conjunction with the choir. In artistic excellence and attendance this Festival eclipsed all former events, and conductor Peter Christian Lutkin is entitled to great credit for the magnificent outcome of his work. Large audiences and able business management also secured financial success. Mr. Andreas Dippel has resigned his appointment as director of the Chicago Opera Company, and is succeeded by Signor Cleofonte Campanini.

COPENHAGEN.

In the presence of the King and Queen of Denmark a Festival concert devoted to works by Wagner took place recently. The programme included the 'Huldigungs-marsch,' played for the first time in Copenhagen.—Richard Strauss's 'Salome' and Wolf-Ferrari's 'Der Schmuck der Madonna' were given for the first time in Copenhagen by the ensemble of the Kiel Municipal Theatre.—Tchaikovsky's second Symphony, Strauss's 'Wanderers Sturmlied,' and Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un Faune' have been played for the first time at concerts given by Musikforeningen (conductor, Prof. Franz Neruda) and the Royal Orchestra (conductor, Herr Carl Nielsen).

DORTMUND.

Two new choral works—a motet, 'Terra tremuit,' by Friedrich Gernsheim and an a cappella chorus, 'Märzluft,' by Hugo Kaun—were performed at the third concert of the Musikalische Gesellschaft.—Max Bruch's 'Salamis,' for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, Hugo Kaun's 'Lied der Freundschaft,' 'Drei Wanderer' by Karl Kaempf, and Ludwig Thuille's 'Rewelge' figured in the programme of the last concert of the Lehrergesangverein.

DRESDEN.

Wolf-Ferrari's choral work, 'Talitha Kuni,' was heard with much interest when lately given for the first time under the direction of Herr Borrmann.

FRANKFURT.

The fourth competition of German Male Choral Societies for the Emperor's 'Wanderpreis' took place on May 5-8. Forty-one Societies took part in the competition. Friedrich Hegar's '1813' had been selected by the Emperor as the obligatory text. The prize chain was awarded to the Berliner Lehrergesangverein (conductor, Prof. Felix Schmidt). The former holders were the Cologne 'Männergesangverein.' The general public displayed great interest in the proceedings, vast audiences being present.

JENA.

The forty-eighth musical Festival of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein took place on June 3-7. The programmes were as follows: June 3—Orchestral concert, consisting of Karl Ehrenberg's tone-poem 'Jugend'; 'Narrenlieder,' for tenor solo and orchestra, by Oskar Ulmer; Violin concerto by Désiré Thomassin; Frederic Delius's tone-poem, 'In a summer garden'; and 'Hyperion,' for baritone solo, mixed chorus and orchestra, by Richard Wetz. June 4—Waldemar von Baussem's Stringsexet; Variations on an original theme, by Arthur Willner; Lieder by Siegfried Kallenberg; a Violoncello sonata by Johanna Senfter; and Wilhelm Berger's Pianoforte quartet. In the evening Pierre Maurice's opera 'Lanval,' preceded by Liszt's symphonic-poem 'Festklänge,' at the Court Theatre at Weimar. June 5—Friedrich Klose's String quartet; Variations for pianoforte solo on the song 'Will mein Junge Äpfel haben,' from Ludwig Thuille's opera 'Lobentanz,' by Heinrich Kaspar Schmid; Theodor Kreiten's Violin sonata; songs by Hermann Zilcher; and a Pianoforte quartet by Manfred Gurlitt. In the evening Karg-Elert's 'Chaconne, Triple Fugue, and Choral' for organ; 'Siegeslied,' for chorus, tenor, organ, and orchestra, by Kurt von Wolzogen; Liszt's Psalm cxxxvii. for soprano, violin, female choir, harp and organ; four Choral preludes for organ by Karl Hasse; and Julius Weisman's Psalm xc. for baritone solo, mixed choir, and orchestra. June 6—Bodo Wolf's tone-poem 'Totenfahrt'; Stavenhagen's second Pianoforte concerto; 'Musik für Orchester,' by Rudi Stephan, and Max Reger's 'Römischer Triumphgesang' for male choir and orchestra. The Festival terminated on June 7 with the production of Alfred Schattmann's comic-opera 'Des Teufels Pergament' at the Court Theatre at Weimar. Prof. Fritz Stein and Herr Peter Raabe were the chief conductors of the Festival.

KÖNIGSBERG.

The third East Prussian Musical Festival took place during May 9-13. Three orchestral and choral concerts and one chamber-music concert were given. The programmes contained excerpts from Mozart's 'Idomeneo,' Beethoven's Triple Concerto and Brahms's Double Concerto, Richard Strauss's 'Symphonia Domestica,' the Overture to a Shakespearean comedy by Paul Scheinpflug, Phantasy 'Vineta,' for three harps and orchestra, by Franz Pönnitz, Pianoforte quartet, Op. 5, by Prince Louis Ferdinand, and Bach's B minor Mass. Messrs. Fritz Steinbach, Siegfried Ochs, Paul Scheinpflug, and Max Brode were the conductors of the Festival.

LEIPZIG.

The Wagner celebrations have been most elaborate even in the master's native town. Performances were given at the Municipal Theatre, of operas from 'Rienzi' to 'Götterdämmerung.' On May 22, at 10:30 a.m., the foundation-stone of the monument by Max Klinger was laid. This was followed at 12 o'clock with a festival concert at the Gewandhaus, when Beethoven's ninth Symphony was given under the direction of Prof. Arthur Nikisch. In the evening a festival performance of 'Die Meistersinger' took place at the Municipal Theatre.—On May 23 an extensive Wagner exhibition was opened, and a concert was given at the Alberthalle on May 24, when 'Das Liebesmahl der Apostel' was performed.

LILLE.

A concert devoted to works by Charpentier was recently given, the programme including fragments from the 'Couronnement de la Muse,' and the choral work, 'La vie du Poète.'

LINZ.

Under the direction of Herr August Göllerich, the eighth Bruckner-Stiftungs Festconcert took place with great success. Bruckner's eight-part Mass in E minor, and his fifth Symphony in B flat major, constituted the programme.

MANNHEIM.

New and interesting String quartets by Robert Kahn and Theodor Streicher were recently produced by the Klingler Quartet and the Mannheimer Quartet. Busoni's opera 'Die Brautwahl' was given for the first time at the Court Theatre.

MAYENCE.

The Philharmonischer Verein have given concert-performances of Boieldieu's opera, 'Ma tante Aurora,' and of Pergolesi's 'Serva padrona.'—On June 2 and 3, concerts devoted to works by Bach and Handel were given by the combined choirs of the Mainzer Liedertafel and the Damengengesangverein. The programmes contained Bach's cantatas, 'Du Hirte Israel's höre,' 'O Ewigkeit du Donnerwort,' and 'Nun ist das Heil,' and Handel's oratorio, 'Israel in Egypt' (in Chrysander's edition).

MILAN.

A number of interesting orchestral works, including the symphonic-poem 'Le chasseur maudit' and Symphony in D minor by César Franck, Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic-variations 'Istar,' Debussy's 'Nuages,' and 'Fêtes,' Dukas's Scherzo 'L'apprenti sorcier,' three 'Impressioni' by Malpiero, 'Ein Heldenleben' by Richard Strauss, Bruckner's E major Symphony, and Busoni's 'Turandot' Suite, have been played at Symphony concerts given at the Scala Theatre.—The Berlin Singakademie (conductor, Prof. Georg Schumann) performed Bach's 'St. John' Passion and Brahms's German 'Requiem' for the first time in Milan.

MONTREAL.

Theodore Dubois's oratorio 'Le Paradis perdu' has been performed here with considerable success.

NURNBERG.

On May 10-12 the fourth Bavarian musical Festival took place. Three concerts were given. Among the many interesting choral compositions performed were Hans Leo Hassler's 'Agnus Dei,' 'Ach weh der Leiden,' and 'Gagliarda'; 'Gott b'hiit dich' by Zechner; Johannes Eccard's 'Uebers Gebirg Maria geht,' and 'Hans und Grete'; Haiden's 'Mach mir ein lustig Liedlein'; 'Crucifixus,' by Lotti; 'Et incarnatus est' and 'Crucifixus,' by Cherubini; and 'Nänie' and the motet 'Warum ist das Licht gegeben,' by Brahms. Bruckner's Te Deum and Handel's oratorio 'Jephtha' were also heard.

PARIS.

Vincent d'Indy's opera 'Fervaa!' was recently performed at the Grand Opéra.—A Festival concert devoted to compositions by M. Fanelli was held under the auspices of the Colonne Concerts. The first performance was given of his 'Impressions Pastorales,' a very interesting work adding much to the composer's already considerable reputation. — At the Theatre des Champs-Élysées Gabriel Fauré's opera 'Pénélope' was given for the first time in Paris with conspicuous success.—A season of the well-known Russian Opera and Ballet Company has also been proceeding at the same theatre. The programme included Moussorgsky's operas 'Boris Godounov' and 'Khovanstchina,' and the ballet 'Thamir' by Balakireff, and Stravinsky's ballets 'Petrouchka,' 'L'Oiseau du feu,' and 'Le Sacre du Printemps' (given for the first time).—On June 4, Charpentier's eagerly-anticipated new opera, 'Julien,' was produced at the Opéra-Comique with much success. The new opera, which is in four Acts and a prologue, is in certain respects a continuation of 'Louise,' and is called by its author 'Poème lyrique,' an appropriate title for a work which has more of poetic than of dramatic action.

REGENSBURG.

In the presence of the Prince Ruprecht, a bust of Richard Wagner, executed by Prof. Bleker, was placed in the Walhalla on May 29.

ROME.

On Sunday, May 18, the composer, Signor Giovanni Sgambati, celebrated his seventieth birthday.

SALZBURG.

Under the auspices of the 'Mozarteum,' five festival concerts (three of chamber music and two orchestral), mainly devoted to works by Mozart, are to take place during August 2-6.

ST. PETERSBURG.

Three interesting Motets by Roger-Ducasse were sung for the first time at a Siloti concert. M. Siloti also gave an interesting chamber music concert consisting of compositions by N. Medtner.—The most interesting feature at the Opera has been the performances of Moussorgsky's 'Khovanstchina.'

STRASBURG.

The fourth Alsace-Lorraine musical Festival took place on May 31-June 2. Three orchestral concerts were given, under the direction of Messrs. Max Reger, Vincent d'Indy, and Hans Pfitzner. Among the works performed were Reger's Variations and Fugue for orchestra on a theme by Johann Adam Hiller, the orchestral Suite 'Namouna' by Lalo, César Franck's 'Psyché,' Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic-poem 'Jour d'été à la montagne,' two Nocturnes by Debussy, the Overture and two interludes from Pfitzner's opera 'Käthechen von Heilbronn,' and compositions by P. de Breville, Guy Ropartz, and Paul Dukas.—Mozart's rarely heard Mass in C minor was recently given under the direction of Herr Mönch.

STUTTGART.

Berlioz's opera 'Die Trojaner' was given during the May Festival performances which took place at the Court Theatre during May 18-24.

VEVEY.

M. Gustave Doret gave four special concerts on May 18-21. The programmes were mainly composed of works by Dr. Saint-Saëns, including his third Symphony, the 'Hymne à Victor Hugo,' fragments from the opera 'Henri VIII.,' and the Pianoforte concerto in C minor (soloist, M. Paderewski). Other works heard were Paderewski's Symphony in B minor and Pianoforte concerto, and a dramatic legend, 'Loys,' by M. Doret. Dr. Saint-Saëns was present, and was much liked.

VIENNA.

Peter Cornelius's comic opera, 'Der Barbier von Bagdad,' and Goldmark's 'Heimchen am Herd,' were recently revived at the Imperial Opera.—The Gustav Mahler prize (the interest on 55,000 Kronen) has been awarded to Herr Arnold Schönberg.

Miscellaneous.

THE IMPERIAL CHOIR AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

At the inauguration of the Anglo-German Exhibition at the Crystal Palace on June 11, the Imperial Choir again proved its usefulness in adding dignity and brilliance to functions of international importance. The programme, which included Dr. Harris's 'Pan,' opened with the 'Ode to friendship,' by John Urich (to German words by the Duke of Argyll), and for the rest was chosen from the Choir's familiar repertory. The Queen's Hall Orchestra assisted.

The following Scholarships and Exhibition are open for competition at the Royal Academy of Music:—The Stainer Exhibition (organ playing), the Goring Thomas Scholarship (for operatic composition), the Macfarren Scholarship (for composition), the Broughton Packer Bath Scholarship (for violoncello playing), the Sainton-Dolby Scholarship (for sopranos), the Sir Michael Costa Scholarship (for composition), the Ada Lewis Scholarships (for pianoforte, violin, and harp playing), the George Mence Smith Scholarship (for singing and general aptitude), the Ross Scholarships (for lady vocalists), the Thomas Threlfall Scholarship (for organ playing). Particulars are obtainable from the Secretary, Royal Academy of Music, York Gate, Marylebone Road, London, N.W.

The American National Federation of Musical Clubs announces a $10,000 prize opera contest. The offer voices the desire of nearly 300 musical organizations and 60,000 music-lovers to make an effort toward the establishment of an American school of opera. The competition is open to composers and librettists who are citizens of the United States. The prize-money has been raised by the city of Los Angeles, where the winning opera will be produced in June, 1915. Manuscripts should be sent during July, 1914, to the Chairman of the American Music Committee (Mrs. Jason Walker), Illinois Trust Safe Deposit Co., Jackson and La Salle Streets, Chicago.

At a concert given in connection with the Meisterschule of Violin-Playing, Vienna, in the Gross Musikverein-Salle, four of the students played virtuoso pieces with orchestra. One of the four was the Newcastle-on-Tyne child, Margaret Fairless. It is an especial mark of honour for a first-year student to appear at an orchestral concert. Her contribution was the Wieniawski Concerto in D minor, and she was greeted with an enthusiastic ovation by the audience.

The London Festival of Empire Girls' Choir, of which Mr. Filmer Rook is conductor and Mr. Granville Humphreys secretary, gave a concert at the Crystal Palace on June 7. Bantock's 'Child-voices' (two-part), King Hall's 'The Daffodils' (three-part), and a female-voice arrangement of the Pilgrims' Chorus from 'Tannhäuser' were the chief numbers in an excellent programme. Choral competitions were held in connection with the event.

The twenty-fifth Annual Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union will take place at the Crystal Palace on July 5. The programme includes choral and solo competitions, a recital on the great organ by Mr. A. R. Stock, and a grand festival concert in the centre transept by over 4,000 voices, conducted by Mr. Frank Idle.

Pupils of Dr. Yorke Trotter at the London Academy of Music took part in a demonstration of his 'Rhythmic method' of music-teaching at Æolian Hall, on June 14. An account is given in the School Music Review for July.

A complete set of the works of Bach, in the Bach Society's edition, has been presented by The King to the Oxford University Music Students' Library.

The Monthly Journal of the International Musical Society contains the third instalment of an interesting article (in German) by Franz Dubitzky on 'Wagner's use of chords.'

We much regret to learn that Dr. Walmisley Little is seriously ill. His numerous friends will wish him speedy recovery.

BY

SIR JOHN STAINER

AND

(Novello's Music Primers, No. 21.)

This Book is a compressed Edition of the Imperial 8vo Edition, published in cloth at 7s. 6d. In reducing it the Editor has endeavoured to omit only such terms as are not in general use; on the other hand he has of course been compelled to eliminate a vast mass of interesting details and facts in order to keep the edition within reasonable limits. Those who have the wish or leisure may be glad to refer to the larger work when available, but to the general public it is hoped that this Primer will be found of practical utility.

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED THE PSALTER NOTED

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainsong, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendices to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainsong. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainsong during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

OFFICE OF HOLY COMMUNION IN G. FOR MEN'S VOICES.
 "Dr. Bunnett's admirable little service supplies a want which has often been felt. It is the work of a devout English Churchman, whose musical experience is ripe with the maturity of many years spent in the service of the sanctuary. It is, moreover, complete, containing as it does all the musical requirements of the present Prayer Book; we venture to hope that it may find a wide acceptance in choirs and places where they sing the Divine Office in the absence of boy-chorists."—Organist and Choirmaster.

A SECOND SET OF 12 SHORT PIECES FOR THE ORGAN.
 "These delightful little compositions will be gladly welcomed by teachers requiring easy pieces for beginners suitable for performance in church as voluntaries. We heartily recommend them. Introduction, Air with Variations, and Finale Fugato for organ. The Norwich Organist, if he has somewhat copied the title of a well-known organ piece by H. Smart has most certainly steered remarkably clear of that piece in both conception and development of his theme—the Aria (B flat) might easily pass for one bearing the name of Joseph Haydn, so charmingly beautiful is it. The Fugue shows some clever and musically treatment of the Air."—Organist and Choirmaster.

By A. H. ALLEN.

First Sonata in D minor for Organ.

"Organists are still under a debt to Messrs. Novello for the steady supply of music specially written for the instrument of their predilection. Foremost in the ranks of the firm's latest issue a place must be assigned to A. H. Allen's Sonata in D minor, which reveals close study of the best models, and, more than this, considerable originality in the composer's own ideas. We believe this is the author's first attempt in sonata form. It is only fair to say that it does him infinite credit. There is some capital fugal writing towards the end of the first movement, which gives place eventually to a well-constructed Intermezzo e Scherzo, adapted for the softer registers and the display of delicate fancy in the executant. A finale, Alla Marcia, partakes more or less of the majestic character of the opening Prelude, though the use of the instrument's weightier tones is postponed for the final climax. The dignity of this closing section is quite exceptional, and as far removed as possible from the meretricious style affected by many writers. The author has a perfect command of harmony, and understands the valuable effect of diatonic passages as opposed to chromatic. His mastery of contrapuntal devices also serves him well. Mr. Allen deserves to be congratulated on his excellent work."—Daily Telegraph, April 22, 1905.

"This is an extremely well-written work by one who is evidently an accomplished organist. In the Prelude the composer employs the rarely used seven-four alternating with three-four tempo. His counterpoint flows naturally and without effort. There is an excellent fugal section in this movement. The Intermezzo is melodious and simple in construction, an Allegretto Scherzando in the middle affording effective contrast. The Finale worthily concludes the Sonata."—Morning Post, October 4, 1904.

"A Sonata in D minor, by A. H. Allen, contains something more than sound workmanship, and the light Scherzo affords excellent contrast to the stately opening movement and the elaborate Finale."—Athenaeum, January 14, 1905.

* * * This book is an endeavour to make some special provision for union hymn-singing and its accompaniment. It deals with a series of Hymns, some suitable for all times, others for particular seasons; it also provides some rich and varied settings in which it is hoped Organists and Choirs as well as Congregations may find pleasure.

EXTRACTS FROM SOME PRESS OPINIONS:

"Should be a valuable supplement to Hymns A. & M. . . . Versions of varied harmony by J. S. Bach and other older composers are used, and admirable modern ones have been written by Sir Charles Stanford, Dr. Charles Wood, Dr. Vaughan Williams, and Rev. J. L. Bennett."—The Times.

"This volume is worth getting and studying . . . there is much in the book that is extremely pleasurable."—The Church Times.

"The whole book is full of interest . . . is certain of wide recognition for its scope and variety."—The Musical Times.

"Altogether a book that should be in wide demand."—Musical Opinion.

"A book of very definite usefulness to the organist . . . The settings all have as their main idea the encouragement of intelligent and artistic congregational singing."—Musica.

"The price is moderate, and we imagine the book will prove of real value to all organists, choirs, and congregations."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"It is most interesting to see the varying harmonic treatment. Organists should get this book."—The Christian World.

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh, and the Victoria University; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

TECHNIQUE

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 60.

The following poem by a well-known Birmingham resident was printed in the programme of the Midland Festival held in May. It is inspired by the condition of things in a great manufacturing town, and by the alleviating mission of music:

Not with the stately pomp, which graced the throng
Of Mastersingers in the days of old,
Our minstrels flock from mine and mill, to hold
In this dark age their Tournament of Song;
Not to these grim discordant times belong
Cities as fair as forest-glades; rich-stoled
Competitors, guilds with their flags of gold,
March not to-day our gloomy roads along.

Yet, 'mid the deafening uproar of the fray
That drowns the Voice Divine, an undertone
Ascends; beneath our turbid life still beats
The heart of Harmony; and blest are they
Who, for the glory of her name alone,
Bring Beauty to be worshipped in our streets.

Alfred Hayes.

The following lines were written by a Manchester choralist who has had to learn some modern 'vocal' music. We do not altogether identify ourselves with its conclusions, but we admit some sympathy:

'THE FREEMAN'S NIGHTMARE!'

I have had enough of discord, and enough of bluff,
But the people wait, and singers wait, and day and night is enough;
Give me a good plain song, and progression which is not wrong,
And the mind's will and the heart's will,
And the heart-ache will not then be in me.

Why should I seek out sorrow and give time away for nought?
I have loved much, but wish not to weep much, for tears by me are not sought;
Good music appeals to my ear, and makes my blood rise up,
Then the sun shines, and the moon shines, and the wine's in the cup.

I have had enough of Delius, and enough of Reger,
For there's one way to give pleasure, and it's soon to the ends of the earth,
And it's then good-night and to bed, and if brain whirls or heart ache,
Well, its Delius or Reger makes sleep too deep to wake.

REPORT OF THE 1912 BLACKPOOL FESTIVAL.

The report of this Festival, held from October 8 to 12, 1912, has only recently been issued. It is a substantial volume of eighty-seven pages, and the criticisms on all the competitors are given in full. It costs one shilling, post-free.

The following are extracts from the general remarks made by adjudicators:

'The continued marked success and progress of the Blackpool Festival is an unmistakable tribute to the chief promoters of the event.

'With all its activities exposed to the full blaze of publicity, the Festival challenges and welcomes all well-informed criticism. Inasmuch as the competitors have to submit their strivings to the rod that chastens, as well as to the judgment that commends, so must all concerned—certainly including the adjudicators—work under this stimulus. It is the glory of the movement that its guiding star is efficiency and that it lays bare all its machinery.

'As to the general results of the 1912 Festival, I should say, in the face of some criticisms that have been uttered, that the progress has been on the line of interpretation. It has been suggested—unjustly, I think—that technique was over-worshipped by competitors, to the exclusion of higher aspects of performance, and that adjudicators also appeared to favour this cult of the means rather than the end. But nothing could be further from the truth. In a Festival that drew over 6,000 competitors it was inevitable that much deficient technique would be exhibited, and therefore be the subject of much comment and advice. But all the chief prizes were awarded to performances which excelled in insight and interpretation. The result of the Rose Bowl Competition was a typical instance. Here Miss Alice Brookes won, not because she possesses a remarkable voice or exceptional vocal technique, but by the sheer force of her temperament in interpreting a very difficult song. . . .

'The Morris Dances and Folk-Song singing were welcome novelties. I hope it may be possible at a future Festival to include an authoritative demonstration of the Jaques-Dalcroze Rhythmic Gymnastics—a last word in the exploitation of the rhythmic potentialities of children, and withal a beautiful sight.'

Mr. Percy Pitt:

'To turn to the Orchestral Competition, I think that the greatest progress was shown in this department, as far as I can recollect, after an absence of five years. The performances of the Berlioz March and of Tchaikovsky's String serenade had many points of real excellence, not only technically, but also from the interpretative side. . . .

'In conclusion, then, and to bring all in all, I am convinced that the Blackpool Festival is in a very healthy condition, and I can only express the hope that it may continue to flourish, for its value as a factor in the musical education of the surrounding country is indisputable.'

Mr. Frederic Austin:

'In the Solo Classes that I judged this year—after an interval, as far as they were concerned, of, I think, three Festivals—I was very much struck with the improvement that had taken place in the meantime in the performance of the average competitor. This I found a more marked feature of these competitions than the existence of many performances of outstanding merit. To reach the latter condition implies, after all, a thoroughness and particular character of training that for your competitors seems to be largely inaccessible. It is very evident, however, that the influences that the Festival Week alone creates and encourages, are doing their work admirably, and one has great hopes of what possible developments it may and will be responsible for in the future in this direction.

'The conditions attaching to the perfection of ensemble singing are obviously more easily grappled with than those belonging to solos, and while I urge that increasing attention should be given to the solo classes, I must give a generous tribute to the standard of extraordinary perfection attained in a typical Festival event and by a choir that is, I believe, a product of the Festival. I refer to the performance by Mr. Clifford Higgin's Choir of Brahms's "The Death of Trench," an effort that it would be difficult indeed to surpass. The remaining days of the Festival, with their greater number of choral competitions, I did not, of course, hear.'

'Elementary School Choirs.—This was a most refreshing and encouraging class, for there was an almost entire absence of bad tone in the children's voices: they did not sing, for the most part, as if they were performing a well-drilled lesson, but as if they loved and enjoyed music for its own sake. Their speech was clear, and they were imbued with the spirit of the songs. The prevailing fault was a common one, and a difficult one to eradicate: the enunciation of consonants in an entirely different way from their sound in correct speech. It is too long a business to explain here; conductors will find the whole thing in any reputable textbook on speech in song, and it is of the utmost importance that they should do so, for anything distorted or unnatural in the words takes away so much from the emotional effect and dissipates any atmosphere that may have been created. . . .

'Female Voice Choirs.—I was extremely pleased to find a test-piece with an accompaniment. There are all too few tests of this sort at Competitive Festivals. The necessity for them is great. Most of the conductors are also conductors of choral Societies, and nearly all their performances fail because they cannot grasp the music as a whole, but give their whole mind to the chorus part, leaving orchestral accompaniment and soloist to flounder along as best they may. In the Sibelius piece not a few conductors did this, making pauses and rallentandos which made it impossible to play the pianoforte part at all artistically. In this class the technical side of the singing was beyond praise, but the interpretation of this passionate song had not sufficient abandon by a long way.

'Mixed-voice Choirs.—I shall never forget the singing of these choirs. I doubt whether it has ever been the lot of any of the adjudicators to listen to so many choirs in one class, all of supreme excellence, singing such music, and singing it so perfectly. The losers can at any rate take this flattering unction to their souls, they sang quite well enough and gained enough marks to bring them out on top in nine competitions out of ten.'

Mr. Hermann Klein:

'... The Blackpool Festival is now a superb organization. It is a marvellous medium for unearthing partially-trained musical talent, and bringing it into the "limelight." Its choral competitions, which have become world-famous, are capable, if restricted to the right lines, of doing enormous good in the future, as they have done in the past. I hope to see the orchestral features in time become equally prominent. Meanwhile, I may offer, as one of the adjudicators, my congratulations upon the highly creditable and promising displays given by the three quartet parties who performed the scene from the opera of "Martha." All three did exceedingly well, and testified to the extreme value of these exhibitions of operatic talent and training as a part of the Festival curriculum.'

BRISTOL EISTEDDFOD.—May 19, 21, 22, 23 and 24.

The eleventh annual musical competition in the city was held throughout the week commencing May 19, at the Victoria Rooms, under a council formed of the principal musicians of Bristol, with Mr. W. E. Fowler as director. There were 584 entries, from all parts of England and Wales, and in all there were nearly 2,000 taking part. Twenty-one choirs entered from Bristol and the immediate district, Midsomer Norton, Radstock, Weymouth, and Plymouth. Other entries were 260 solo singers, 185 pianists, 47 violinists and violoncello players, and 70 reciters, besides a large number of competitors for vocal and instrumental duets and sight-reading tests. The adjudicators were Dr. H. Walford Davies, Dr. A. J. Silver, Mr. Daniel Price, Mr. Herbert Fryer, and Mrs. Tobias Matthay. The competition for a pianoforte created the greatest enthusiasm. There were 31 entries. The test-piece was 'Thème Varié' (Paderewski), and Egerton Tidmarsh, from the Royal Academy of Music, was proclaimed the winner; Kitty Newton (Bristol) coming second. An objection was made to the winner on the ground that he had previously won a similar prize elsewhere, and as this breach of the regulations at Bristol was established, Miss Newton, who was only one point behind him, received the award. The silver cup awarded in the championship contest for pianoforte playing went to Rosalie M. Stokes, of the Royal College of Music, London. The gold medal for violin playing was won by Miss Elsie Gregory, of the Royal Academy of Music. Prizes for solo-singing were won by Edith M. Bell, Bristol (soprano, classical air); Florence Hamlin, Bridgewater (soprano, ballad); Muriel Michell, London (contralto, classical air and ballad, also the champion solo singing contest); William Cunningham, Bristol (tenor, classical air); Oliver Lewis, Bristol (tenor, ballad); A. Lancelot Willett, Weston-super-Mare (bass or baritone, classical air); P. E. Underwood, Gloucester (bass or baritone, ballad). In the class for men's choirs (not more than 80 voices) Plymouth Orpheus were first and Midsomer Norton second. In that for not more than 40 voices, Weymouth were first and Kingswood Philharmonic second. The choral competitions for school choirs proved the most interesting of the whole Festival; the shield for girls' choirs was won by the Windmill Hill Senior Girls; that for boys by St. Nicholas, bracketed with St. Leonard. Among the Junior Choral Societies, St. Anne's Madrigal Boys took first place.

DUBLIN.—May 19-24.

The Feis Ceoil was quite successful. The adjudicators all expressed themselves pleased with the high standard generally shown among the competitors in all competitions.

On Wednesday evening the chief choral competition, in which one of the test-pieces was Bateson's 'Canella fair,' brought forward some of the best choral singing ever heard at Dublin. The prize went to Miss Culwick's 'Orpheus' Choir. The singing of the Northern Choir from Derry (the only other competitor) was extremely good. Their conductor is Mr. A. J. Cunningham.

The 'Denis O'Sullivan Memorial Medal' was awarded to Mr. E. O'Connor Cox, and the 'Plunket Greene' cup to Miss Maude Harrington-Clancy. These were two of the most closely contested competitions of the week, and attracted 40 and 45 entries respectively. In the choral singing in Irish, test-pieces were specially composed for this Festival by Dr. Esposito, Dr. Jozé, Mr. Joseph Seymour, Mr. Robert O'Dwyer, Mr. Vincent O'Brien, and Mr. Carl Hardebeck. They have been published by the Vincent Music Company. The 'Cosslett-Heller Cup II.' (presented by the members of the Irish Ladies' Choir to replace the cup won out for the third time last year) was carried off by Mr. A. J. Cunningham's 'Northern Female-Voice Choir' (Derry). 'The Students' Cup' for pianoforte sight-reading, presented by Mrs. Maxwell Hutton and Miss Maude Hutton, was won by Miss Helen Macdonald. The Ladies' Committee Prize of £15, for which the test was part of Act 2 from 'Martha,' was won by the 'Carlton' Quartet (Miss Lilian Whitaker, Miss Edith Mortier, Mr. William Lewin and Mr. A. G. Birch), with Mr. Harold White as accompanist. The Special Chamber Music Prize of £10 (test-piece, Schumann's Op. 47), was won by Rev. R. A. Oulton's Quartet, consisting of Miss Sylvia McCready, Miss Muriel Smith, Miss Emily Penrose, and Rev. R. A. Oulton (pianoforte).

ABERDEEN.—May 21, 23, 24, 25.

Although this Festival has to a large extent developed into an event for the performance of works on a comprehensive scale, we have elected to deal in the RECORD with all its activities in order to provide an object-lesson to competitive Festivals generally. We know perfectly well that such a remarkable outcome as that achieved at Aberdeen is not possible in all cases, even at the large Festivals, but there can always be an aim in this direction.

The Aberdeen scheme is the realisation of the ideas of Prof. Sanford Terry (a sketch of whose career and whose portrait appeared in the July Musical Times). His temporary illness prevented his attendance on this occasion, a circumstance deeply regretted by everyone concerned. As recorded in our last issue, His Majesty King George conferred the honour of his patronage on the Festival. This distinction was no doubt brought about by the influence of the Earl of Aberdeen, who takes the keenest possible interest in the event, and who journeyed from Dublin for the purpose of being present.

Two concerts were given. At the first (May 23) the choral items were Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and Elgar's part-song 'Go, song of mine,' and the programme included Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 6, for wood-wind, cembalo, and strings, Bach's Suite in B minor, No. 2, for flute and strings, Elgar's String serenade in E minor, and Dvorák's Serenade for strings, Op. 22. Mr. Hamilton Harry conducted the instrumental items, and Mr. Clemens the choral numbers. The orchestra and Festival choir were splendidly efficient. The second concert was of even greater importance, for it brought forward for the first time at Aberdeen Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music. This monumental work had been punctiliously rehearsed by Mr. Warren Clemens, whose ability was put to a severe test. It says much for the young conductor that he emerged so very successfully from the ordeal. The performance was unquestionably an adequate one, and it made a profound impression. The principal artists were Miss Jane Burt, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Campbell McInnes. The Elgar-Atkins edition was used. The orchestra was complete and efficient, and the Festival choir greatly distinguished themselves. The whole result must have been a solace to Prof. Terry in his enforced absence.

The following were the tests, entries, and results in the chief choral classes:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

- Tests: 'The gardener' (Brahms).
'Lift thine eyes' (Mendelssohn).

Other prize-winning junior choirs were Poplar Training School (Hutton), Marks Tey, Tolleshunt Major, Tollesbury Band of Hope, and Shenfield.

The adjudicators were Mr. Clive Carey and Dr. H. P. Allen.

LEITH HILL.—The ninth annual Spring Festival was held with considerable success. In the first division of the choral contests the chief prizes were taken by Capel, Coldharbour Female-voice Choir, Shere (in male-voice and madrigal classes), and Westcott. In the second division Brockham Choir was first in all classes. The adjudicator was Dr. Walford Davies.

SPENNYMOOR (DURHAM).—A choral competition was held here on Wednesday, June 18, in connection with the Annual Cricket Club Gala. Six choirs entered, the tests being Macfarren's 'The miller,' and a piece of their own selection. ISADOR EPSTEIN.

18, Wigmore Street, W., and 12, Priory Road, N.W.

SHORT HOLIDAY COURSE FOR TEACHERS.

BUSONI writes: "Mr. Epstein worked with me during one summer which he spent in Berlin; at that time he surprised me by his quick comprehension and by the rapid development of his piano-playing. Since, he has become a distinguished artist and a successful teacher, so that I heartily wish him any further satisfaction in his career, as he deserves."

DAILY TELEGRAPH, March 20, 1913:

"If we may judge by the results displayed at his 'Monthly Musicales,' at the Brinsmead Galleries, Mr. Isador Epstein's methods as a teacher are calculated to bring out all that is best in his pupils. Certainly, in the playing of the five young pianists who provided last night's programme there was every sign of musical intelligence carefully cultivated, and of fingers guided in the way in which fingers should go. They played with a most excellent crispness and with decision, and the foundations, both technical and artistic, seem to have been firmly laid."

MR. CHARLES TREE.

Torquay News, May 14, 1913, says:—"He is well known as one of the finest baritones in England, and his remarkable range and purity of voice, together with his ease of production, place him on a plane far above the average singer. His renderings were triumphs of dramatic singing."

Exmouth Journal, July 5, 1913, says:—"Mr. Tree's triumph. He possesses that golden key which can take its owner at will straight to the hearts and impulse-springs. Added to his delightful voice is that divine spark of genius which marks and makes the great artist. He sang in perfectly natural and easy fashion, with that apparent lack of effort which in itself delights the listener, conveying to the audience the spirit of a composition as easily as an artist places colour on canvas. The audience were excited to a pitch of enthusiasm not often witnessed. Mr. Tree's work was above criticism, for it represented the soul of a great artist going out to those of his hearers."

Nottingham Guardian, February 25, 1913:—"Mr. Tree, whose brilliant baritone has been heard here several times of late, again revealed his mastery singing."

"How to procure Ease of Voice-Production," by Charles Tree. "The Key to the Long Life of the Voice."—Vide Press. Published by Joseph Williams. May be ordered at any music shop.

RULE, BRITANNIA

BY

WILLIAM HAYMAN CUMMINGS.

PREFACE.

The glorious National Song, "Rule, Britannia," is familiar to the whole British Race; nevertheless, very few men and women are acquainted with the history of its birth and parentage.

In the following pages I have endeavoured to chronicle all the facts which are discoverable by diligent research, and to present them in an attractive and entertaining manner.

The life of Dr. Arne, the composer of "Rule, Britannia," offers to the reader and to the music student an interesting and instructive story, showing that natural ability, even when combined with genius, is not sufficient to ensure a triumphant and successful career. Morality and conscientious rectitude in the affairs of life is essential, and had Arne exercised these, his exceptional gifts might have enabled him to surpass his great contemporary, Handel.

It only remains to be noted that many letters and documents are here printed for the first time, some of them copied from the original autographs in my possession. They illuminate much which has hitherto been obscure and uncertain in the career of a famous composer.

GEORGE FREDERICK HANDEL.

FROM THE PORTRAIT BY MERCIER.

Reproduced by the kind permission of

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF MALMESBURY.

The Musical Times

AUGUST 1, 1913.

A PORTRAIT OF HANDEL.

By the generous permission of the Earl of Malmesbury we are privileged to give with this number of the Musical Times a reproduction of the fine portrait of Handel which is in his Lordship's possession at Heron Court, Christchurch. This portrait is reproduced in the recently published book on 'Tschudi [Shudi], the Harpsichord Maker,' by William Dale, F.S.A., which is reviewed on p. 523. In this book Mr. Dale, to whose courtesy we are much indebted, says:

"The finest portrait of Handel in existence is that by Philip Mercier, in possession of the Earl of Malmesbury. Mercier was a German painter of French extraction, and came to England from Hanover with Frederick Prince of Wales, the son of George II. and father of George III., whose portrait he painted and brought with him. Handel's portrait has on the back of the canvas the following inscription: "Portrait of Mr. Handel given by him to Thomas Harris, Esquire, about 1748." It was probably painted a little earlier, at the time when he had recovered from his bankruptcy of 1745, and when his health and his fortunes had taken a turn for the better; for we read in the Letters of the First Earl of Malmesbury that Lord Shaftesbury reports him in 1746 as never looking so cool and well, and says that he had been buying some fine pictures. Thomas Harris was the brother of James Harris, who became first Earl of Malmesbury. The more gifted of the two undoubtedly was the elder brother James, known in the brilliant literary circle in which he moved as "Hermes"; but Thomas was equally fond of music, and it is evident was among those who formed the inner circle of Handel's friends. It is "Councillor" Thomas Harris who witnessed Handel's will and the first three codicils. In the last codicil he becomes a beneficiary by a legacy of £300. In the picture the composer is seen hard at work, his wig laid aside and his shirt unbuttoned, while his harpsichord is open at his side. Through the kindness of the present Earl of Malmesbury the picture is here for the first time faithfully reproduced with its accessories. The harpsichord, evidently painted from one at which Handel actually sat, is extremely interesting. It is not a Ruckers but an English instrument of the least expensive make. It is "single," that is having only one row of keys, and as only one stop is shown on the left-hand side, there could have been only three in all—octave, first unison, and second unison. But the keyboard is the most noticeable. The black sharps are inlaid with a white slip, which was the custom of both John and Thomas Hitchcock, and was imitated by several other English makers. That Shudi occasionally adopted this form of keyboard is known, for the two harpsichords of 1766 by him, so long preserved in the apartments of Frederick the Great in the New Palace at Potsdam and now in the Hohenzollern Museum at the Palace of Monbijou in Berlin, have such keyboards. The harpsichord therefore shown in the Mercier portrait may well have been one of Shudi's. Several of Handel's MSS. accompanied the gift of the picture to Thomas Harris and are preserved at Heron Court."

WAGNER AND FRANZ LACHNER.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

Wagner's Autobiography has been before the world only a couple of years, but already its reliability as a record of the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth has been considerably shaken. No one charges him, of course, with deliberate falsification; but there are a good many suppressions of the truth and a good many evasions of it. Wagner forgot one thing when he was writing the book,—that he had in his time written probably more letters than any other man of his day, and that there was a more than average probability that the bulk of these would be preserved and published. The most casual reader of 'Mein Leben' who had also read the Wesendonck correspondence could not fail to be struck by the disingenuousness of Wagner's treatment of that most important episode in his life; few of us could refrain from smiling at his remark about 'my purely friendly relations' with Mathilde. Frequently the record falls demonstrably short of the full truth, as in the case of Minna, and again in that of Friederike Meyer. At other times an ingenious suppression of the full truth is concealed under a deceptive air of candour. The revelations made by Ferdinand von Hornstein, shortly after the appearance of 'Mein Leben,' as to the real truth of Wagner's relations with von Hornstein's father, Baron Robert von Hornstein, were in themselves sufficient to make us all henceforth read the Autobiography with caution.* And now further evidence that Wagner, owing to the biassed nature of his likes and dislikes, is not to be absolutely trusted either in his estimates of people to whom he had an antipathy, or even in his account of them, is afforded by some documents relating to Lachner that have been published for the first time in Sebastian Röckl's 'Ludwig II. und Richard Wagner.'† Wagner hated Lachner and had never a good word for him, and he has of course been followed with canine docility by out-and-out Wagnerians like Glasenapp.

The first reference to Lachner in 'Mein Leben' is under the year 1842. Wagner had written, he tells us, two articles in Paris à propos of Halévy's opera, 'La Reine de Chypre.' In the article published in the Dresden 'Abendzeitung,' he says: 'I made particularly merry over a mischance that had befallen Kapellmeister Lachner.' Küstner, the Munich director, had commissioned a libretto for Lachner from St. Georges, of Paris (the librettist of 'La Reine de Chypre'). After the production of the latter opera, it turned out that this book and that of the Lachner opera were virtually identical. In reply to Küstner's angry protests, St. Georges 'expressed his astonishment that the former should have imagined that for the paltry price offered in the German commission he would supply a text intended only for the German stage. As I had already formed my own opinion as to this French opera-text business, and nothing in the world would have induced me to set to music even the most effective piece of Scribe or St. Georges, I was greatly delighted at this occurrence, and in the best of spirits I let myself go on the subject for the benefit of the readers of the "Abendzeitung," who, it is to be hoped, did not include my future "friend," Lachner.* Evidently he did not love Lachner.

The next reference to him in 'Mein Leben' is in 1855. Wagner had returned to Zürich after his London concerts. There he learned that Dingelstedt, at that time Intendant of the Munich Court Theatre, wished to give 'Tannhäuser' there, 'although,' says Wagner, 'thanks to Lachner's influence,' the place was not particularly well disposed towards him.†

The third reference to Lachner is in 1858, just before Wagner's departure from the 'Asyl'; there was a 'national vocal festival' at Zürich that seems to have irritated Wagner a good deal, depressed as he was at that time by the Minna-Mathilde catastrophe. Lachner was taking part in the festival. Wagner gave him the cold shoulder, and refused to return his call.‡

Now let us see, from documents of the time, how matters really stood as regards Lachner. In 1854 Wagner was hoping to get 'Tannhäuser' produced at Munich, where, as we have seen, Dingelstedt was Intendant and Lachner Kapellmeister. Lachner was a conductor and composer of the old school. Wagner had a poor opinion of him, and apparently thought him incompetent to do justice to 'Tannhäuser.' 'I don't at all know,' he writes to Liszt on May 2, 1854,§ 'how to get Lachner out of the way. He is an utter ass and knave.' In the summer of 1852 there had been some talk of giving 'Tannhäuser' at Munich. Lachner thought it advisable first to familiarise the public with the style of the work by giving the overture at a concert on November 1. The success was doubtful. Wagner had previously sent Lachner a copy of the explanatory programme of the overture that he had written in the preceding March for the Zürich orchestra. Perhaps this was thought too long for the Munich programme; in any case a much shorter 'explanation' was given, that aroused Wagner's ire.* With his customary suspicion of people he did not like, he assumed that the concert production of the overture was a deliberate attempt to prejudice the public against the opera. This suspicion, as Sebastian Röckl says, finds no support in the external facts. A fortnight after the Munich performance of the overture, 'Tannhäuser' was given at Wiesbaden with great success, and soon became one of the favourite pieces of the repertory of the theatre there. Dingelstedt at once sent his theatre inspector, Wilhelm Schmitt, to Zürich, to arrange with Wagner for a production at Munich.

Unexpected difficulties arose, however; an outcry was raised against the proposed performance of a work by 'the Red Republican, Richard Wagner,' and there was opposition on the part of the Bavarian Minister, von der Pforten. By the spring of 1854 all obstacles had been removed, and, as we have already seen, Dingelstedt now arranged with Wagner for the production, although the composer thought Munich 'not particularly well disposed towards him, thanks to Lachner's influence.' Having heard that the singer destined for the part of Tannhäuser was incompetent, Wagner asked Dr. Härtinger, of the Munich Opera, to undertake it. Härtinger came to Zürich, in May, to study the rôle with the composer, and seems to have deepened Wagner's mistrust of and contempt for Lachner. The performance did not take place, as was intended, in the summer of 1854, but, as Röckl says, the cause of the postponement was not Lachner but the cholera.

Later on, Dingelstedt found himself unable to fulfil his promises to Wagner with regard to the honorarium. 'Thereupon,' says Röckl, 'Lachner, fearing that he might be looked upon as answerable for the production having fallen through a second time, wrote to his friend Kapellmeister G. Schmidt, of Frankfort, asking him to arrange with the composer for more favourable conditions.† In the end this was done. 'And now,' says Röckl,‡ 'Lachner, although in his innermost conscience, an opponent of the "musician of the future," did all he could in order to produce the work as excellently as was possible to him. Rehearsal after rehearsal was held, though the musicians were always moaning over the extraordinary efforts they were called upon to make,—as is shown by reference to a Munich comic paper of the time.'

* 'Mein Leben,' i., 248, 249 (German edition). The word 'friend' is put in inverted commas by Wagner himself. The passage to which he refers will be found in 'Bericht über eine neue Pariser Oper,' in his 'Gesammelte Schriften,' fifth edition, i., 244. He there mentions 1,500 francs as the sum paid by the Munich director for the libretto. In the original article in the 'Abendzeitung,' according to Mr. Ashton Ellis, the amount was given as 3,000 francs, and Lachner was referred to not as Kapellmeister Lachner, but 'der brave Lachner.'

§ Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt, ii., 25.

* See his letter to Uhlig of November 27, 1852.

As the tenor was unmistakably incompetent, a singer who was already familiar with the work was engaged from another opera house. 'Tannhäuser' was given on August 12, 1855, with extraordinary success. Lachner was called on the stage, whence he thanked the audience in Wagner's name. He communicated the evening's result to the composer, and received a letter, dated August 17, 1855, warmly thanking him for the trouble he had taken over the work and the sympathy he felt with it, and for the friendliness of his feelings towards Wagner; and he was asked to thank the singers and orchestra in Wagner's name. 'Finally accept the assurance of my great gratification at having been brought by this circumstance closer to yourself. I sincerely hope for a continuance of this approach to an understanding that is necessary for the artist and possible for him alone.'*

The success of 'Tannhäuser' emboldened Dingelstedt to venture upon 'Lohengrin' for the winter of 1856, but various events conspired against the production. In February, 1857, Dingelstedt resigned the Intendantship. 'Lohengrin' was put in rehearsal by his successor, von Frays, in November, 1857, and produced on February 28, 1858, under Lachner. It was well received on the whole, but the opera found more antagonists than 'Tannhäuser' had done.

From July 21 to August 2 there was held at Zürich the vocal festival at which, as we have seen, Wagner refused to receive Lachner. What Röckl rightly calls the ambiguous words of Wagner in this connection in 'Mein Leben' are explained by the following letter from the composer to Lachner, that is published for the first time in Röckl's book:

Highly honoured Sir and Friend,

Now that, after a long and painful interruption of the way of living I have been accustomed to for many years, I have again won a little repose, permit me to approach you with the remembrance of your so friendly advances to me last summer, in order in some degree to link myself again with the life on which you have imprinted a significantly agreeable memory. If you found something strange at our meeting, something on my part apparently not quite corresponding to your friendly intentions, I now permit myself, by way of exculpation, to say that at that time I was in a very agitated and embarrassed frame of mind; few people know what difficult resolutions were maturing in me at that time.† It may, however, suffice for me to tell you that only now, after leaving my friendly refuge by the Lake of Zürich, in order to compose myself here, in the greatest seclusion, for the resumption of my work, the pleasant and encouraging significance of your Zürich visit has become quite clear to me. By my sincere regret to know that you were in some degree hurt through a mistake of my servant,‡ you probably nevertheless understood even then how earnestly I realised the value of your visit; your friendly assurance that you were satisfied with my explanation of that misunderstanding was most tranquillising for me. Let me now say that I estimate highly the value of your advances, and with my whole heart I shall do my best to deserve your friendship,—if you will favour me with it,—and most sincerely to reciprocate it. On the occasion of another personal meeting, if you will be so good, I hope that you will learn, with some satisfaction, in what sense I give you this assurance. I chiefly remember with the greatest pleasure that you expressed to me the wish that perhaps the first performance of my latest work, 'Tristan and Isolde,' might be entrusted to you. I have so agreeable a recollection of this wish, that I can only regret not being able to gratify it immediately. Unfortunately, just at the time when we met I was so grievously interrupted in this very work, that only now again, for the first time, can I cherish the hope of getting into the proper mood for continuing and completing it. Consequently this opus is not one as to the time of whose coming to the light I can decide anything definite—which is in every respect unpleasant for me.

The friendly wish you showed to occupy yourself with me once more soon, emboldens me, however, to approach you with regard to the granting of a very big request on my part. My 'Rienzi' has again been given in Dresden with great success, and since I now no longer have any special reason for keeping back this effective work of my youth, I have been inviting the theatres that are friendly to me to take up this opera as quickly as possible; in so doing I am moved by the firm conviction that I am recommending to them a very good and remunerative theatrical work. Almost all whom I have approached have fallen in with my wishes. Would you therefore think it too bold of me if I were to request you also to get this score (which you have only to ask for, in my name, of Chordirektor Wilhelm Fischer, of Dresden) without much hesitation and delay, and to see what you can do with this wild creature of my youth, now tamed, for my consolation and benefit, while I am finishing 'Tristan'?

I beg you not to take this amiss. But in any case I owe you very great thanks, and if you are not angry with me on account of this request, I shall take this as a particularly good sign.

In any case I may probably hope to receive soon from you a friendly reply; console me also with the assurance that you have forgiven me, and accept in return the attestation of the sincerest devotion and esteem of

Your most indebted

Lachner at once got the score of 'Rienzi' from Fischer, and wrote to Wagner (October 13) expressing his pleasure at the prospect of an early production of the opera. 'In spite, however, of his sincere endeavours,' says Röckl, "'Rienzi'"

* Röckl, p. 12.

† The reader will remember that the Wesendonck catastrophe was just then drawing to a head.

‡ In the light of Wagner's own account of the affair in 'Mein Leben' we can only regard this as a piece of fiction.

* Röckl, pp. 17, ff.

was not put into rehearsal. The reading committee felt the subject to be inadmissible on religious grounds.*

In July, 1860, von Frays had the idea of giving the 'Flying Dutchman,' and wrote to Wagner on the matter. Wagner thought that Lachner had been the moving spirit in this, and thanked him warmly in a hitherto unpublished letter of August 20, 1860.* But again Wagner's ill-luck intervened. Von Frays had to resign the Intendanthip on account of illness, and his successor abandoned the 'Flying Dutchman' project by reason of the expense of the new inscenation.

The reader is now in a position to estimate the true value of Wagner's disparaging references to Lachner in 'Mein Leben.' He seems to have started out with a prejudice against him that nothing could alter. Lachner was admittedly by temperament and training, and both as conductor and composer, in the opposite camp to Wagner. This, however, only entitles him to the more commendation for the pains he took to establish Wagner in Munich, and for the care he expended upon the performances.† Wagner nurses his imaginary grievance against the man, persists in believing that he is prejudicing Munich against him, insults him and denies him his door in Zürich; and then, when he has need of him, writes to him in the friendliest and most flattering way. Finally, when he writes his memoirs, he forgets all that Lachner had, on his own admission, done for him, forgets his own letters of thanks, and refers to him throughout in a tone of scarcely-veiled contempt and dislike. What conclusion can we come to except that it would be imprudent of us to accept, without corroborative evidence, Wagner's disparaging opinion of anyone he detested? No doubt he found Lachner in his way when, under cover of King Ludwig's favour, he was trying to transform the musical life of Munich. But even if Lachner did intrigue against him then, as the Wagnerians always hold, he was simply acting in self-defence; and in any case Wagner, when he came to write his autobiography, should not have passed over Lachner's earlier services to him without a word, and still less have given the unsuspecting reader the impression that Lachner's opposition to him began several years before it actually did. Once more we feel that had Wagner only postponed the writing of 'Mein Leben' for a few years, till he had quite got over the bitterness of his Munich failure, the book would have been both pleasanter in tone and more reliable in fact.

* Rückl, pp. 21, ff.

† It is even doubtful whether his conducting was as detrimental to the operas as Wagner seems to have thought. The historical records show that both 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin' were very well received under his baton. Liszt heard a performance of 'Tannhäuser' under Lachner at Munich in 1836, and writes thus to Wagner under date December 12 of that year: 'Lachner had certainly rehearsed the score with the utmost precision and care, for which we can only thank and praise him.' He doubts whether Lachner understood the drama as Wagner understood it; but granting that, the trouble that Lachner had evidently taken to do justice to the music is all the more creditable to him.

NEW ORATORIO BY DR. SAINT-SAËNS 'THE PROMISED LAND.'

At an age when—if they live so long—most musicians are seeking for retirement and rest, Saint-Saëns, the most versatile and scholarly of the musicians of our time, is seeking new worlds to conquer. Not that the field of oratorio is altogether fresh to him, for among his numerous works we find an 'Oratorio de Noël' (Op. 12), the Psalm, 'Coeli enarrant' (Op. 42), and the cantata, or oratorio, or Biblical opera (for so it is variously styled), 'Le Déluge' (Op. 45); to which might not unfairly be added the scriptural opera, 'Samson et Dalila,' which was long given in this country as an oratorio, until somebody at last realised that no great harm could accrue from giving it in accordance with the composer's original intention. So now it has been made a stock piece at Covent Garden, and 'nobody seems one penny the worse.'

To write an English oratorio to a text arranged from the English Bible, and intended for production before an English audience, was, however, a new departure. Saint-Saëns has for many years been a familiar and popular figure in this country, where he has appeared as composer, pianist, and organist, and our appreciation of him as a musician was testified when, in 1893, he was dubbed a Doctor of Music at Cambridge, as well as in the commemorative jubilee performances in London this spring, in which he was the leading figure. So there was something appropriate in his composing 'The Promised Land,' dedicating it to Queen Alexandra, and conferring upon Gloucester the distinction of producing it. The score of the oratorio has just been published by Messrs. Novello in their well-known 'Octavo Edition,' on the strength of which a brief description of the work may be attempted.

The text, which has been arranged by Mr. Hermann Klein, is exclusively scriptural, being compiled from the Books of Numbers and Deuteronomy, and the Psalms. The subject is of course akin to that dealt with in famous works by Handel and Rossini, but the relationship is purely superficial. The oratorio is not a long one—the vocal score consists of 106 pages—but it is divided into three parts. In the first is presented to us the character of Moses, the 'very meek' man appointed to lead the chosen people out of the land of Egypt, and the 'action'—if so it may be styled—begins in the desert of Zin, where the congregation complain bitterly of the lack of water. Moses and Aaron are directed to 'speak to' the rock to bring forth water, and Moses in his anger speaks 'unadvisedly' to his rebellious followers, and smites the rock, thus incurring the wrath of the Lord—because, as we are given to understand, he showed a lack of complete faith in not following the letter of the command, and also, perhaps, because he 'spake unadvisedly' in addressing the people.

In the second part of the oratorio the real reason for God's displeasure is plainly stated to be the lack of belief which underlay the conduct of Moses and Aaron, and their punishment is declared: they shall not enter the Promised Land. This sentence they receive in contrition and humility, and Moses, warned of his approaching death, is inspired with what is known as 'The Song of Moses,' which he teaches to the children of Israel: 'Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak: Hear, O earth, the words of my mouth,' &c.

In the concluding part Moses ascends Mount Abarim, whence he beholds the land he may not enter, and where he is 'gathered unto his people.' He accepts his lot in the spirit to be expected from one who, as we have already been told, was 'very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth,' and gives expression to his trust in the wisdom and mercy of the Lord, to Whose keeping he commits his flock. The death of Moses, his burial in some remote valley of Moab, and the lamentation of the People of Israel over their leader, are narrated, and the oratorio ends with a chorus eulogising Moses, and calling upon the Israelites to devote themselves to the Lord, Who will bring them over Jordan to possess the Promised Land.

In setting this to music, Saint-Saëns would seem, whether consciously or not, to have borne in mind the traditions of oratorio which are dear to English people. Save in the broadest sense he has not attempted to make a connected drama of his work, but has regarded it as a mixture of narrative, drama, and reflections, the one merging insensibly into the other. And he has to some degree gone behind modern, or, at least, recent usage, in arranging his music into more or less distinct divisions of choruses, quartets, airs, recitatives, and so forth: not, of course, in the water-tight compartments of Handel's time, but in the more connected style of Spohr and later composers. At this time criticism, whether favourable or otherwise, must of course be strictly avoided, but it is a mere matter of description to point out that choral Societies will in all probability welcome a work which gives the choir greater prominence than is usually the case nowadays, for many of the choruses are well-developed examples of the old contrapuntal type that, for this purpose, is hard to beat. One other assertion may be made with safety—partly from a reading of the vocal score, partly from one's knowledge of the composer—that the music is throughout practicable and effective. As Saint-Saëns has been at some pains to abjure the tendency to Wagnerism which patriotic Frenchmen so deplored in his earlier works, it is not surprising if we find hardly any trace of a systematic use of leading themes. Possibly a closer acquaintance may bring to light other examples, but so far there do not seem to be many cases in which a subject is transferred from one movement to another.

One instance of this occurs in the first two bars of the Prelude, a well-developed and independent piece, covering nine pages of the score. It is this short, emphatic phrase:

which we shall meet again, in slightly varied form, as the opening line of a chorale sung by the Israelites on the death of Moses. In this place it initiates a dignified introductory movement of twenty-five bars, which leads to the fugal treatment of a chromatic subject that recalls an episode in the introduction to 'Samson et Dalila,' where a similar orchestral figure accompanies the chorus. Here it assumes this form:

As it is developed, the effect is enhanced by a semiquaver figure of accompaniment, and a gradual climax leads to an impressive culmination, in which the opening phrase already quoted (No. 1) reappears. Then the character of the music changes; the tempo is quickened to Allegretto, and we have a passage based on a figure which must be quoted, since its use later on suggests that it is meant to connote the land 'flowing with milk and honey':

It may therefore be convenient to refer to it hereafter as the 'Promised Land' figure.

It brings in its course an alteration of the measure from $\frac{2}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{2}$, and presently some new melodic phrases are introduced:

and lead to the concluding section of the Prelude, beginning thus:

In the continuation of this the Prelude soon comes to a tranquil ending.

A considerable proportion of the choruses in the oratorio are for a double choir (each choir of four voices), and the opening one, 'Now the man Moses was very meek,' is after this pattern. The two choirs are at first used responsively, and without accompaniment, save an occasional chord from the organ, and when the orchestra enters it introduces (at the words, 'And will bring them unto a land') the figure of accompaniment which we recognize as the 'Promised Land' theme (No. 3). Its gracious character is now explained by its association with the familiar words,

'flowing with milk and honey,' upon which the composer dwells until, breaking off suddenly, the tenor soloist, in a recitative, tells how the people rebelled against their leaders. Their complaint is embodied in a dramatic four-part chorus, based on a theme treated in imitation, the sopranos leading off:

Ex. 6. Allegro animato.

This is developed with great energy, and towards the close is combined with a chromatic phrase, and is heard in inversion. The excitement abates, and after a few bars for the orchestra, based on the original theme, the chorus ends in a mood of quiet despair. Then the tenor takes up the narrative again, which is this time shared by the contralto, and their recitative brings us to the first appearance of Moses, whose speech to the people is heralded by two weighty phrases terminating in cadenza-like passages for the cor anglais and the clarinet respectively. His opening words are set as recitative, after which the music of his solo assumes a more formal guise, though his phrases are still somewhat declamatory in character. After his momentary outburst, a quieter vein sets in: and this, notwithstanding one rather strenuous passage, expresses the mood of this short solo, which in its general character recalls the Mendelssohnian 'Arioso.'

The tenor recitative, telling how Moses struck the rock, is accompanied by chromatic passages depicting the gushing forth of the water, and these continue whilst the double choir take up the story in short responsive phrases. The concluding section of the first part is by way of reflection on the story, so far as it is as been unfolded, and takes the form of an extended trio (soprano, contralto, and tenor) and double choir. The contralto begins with broad lyrical phrases, to a repeated figure of accompaniment, which give way to a more abrupt dramatic style at the words, 'Behold, he smote the rock!' This is illustrated in the orchestra by a graphic figure for the trombones:

of which considerable use is made both now and later on, when reference is made to the act of Moses in striking, instead of speaking to, the rock. In this sense, indeed, it almost rises to the importance of a leading motive.

The choir take up the words referred to in similar detached phrases, and develop the idea at some length. Then the soprano soloist, followed by the tenor, enter, their phrases being echoed by the choir in the same fashion, and this is succeeded by a short ensemble for the three voices, begun by the tenor:

A new section is opened by the soprano soloist with a phrase which reminds us of the affinity with the 18th-century composers that Saint-Saëns now and again betrays in his music:

Ex. 10. Allegro non troppo.

As before, the soloists' words and musical phrases are echoed by the double choir, and a grave figure of accompaniment assists in the climax now worked up, leading to the vigorous responsive chorus, Molto allegro, which ends Part I.

The twelve introductory bars for orchestra, with which the Second Part begins, are based upon the phrase with which the Prelude opened (No. 1). A short contralto recitative, accompanied by the organ, tells of the punishment of Moses and Aaron for their unbelief, and leads to a duet (tenor and baritone) for these two protagonists in the drama. An introduction of nine bars is based on a fanciful figure given out by the oboe, which, as it recurs in the course of the duet, deserves to be quoted:

Then the baritone (Moses) enters:

A quickening of the time, and a flowing semi-quaver accompaniment, mark the words 'Turn to us again, O Lord,' and are continued during a section which modulates into E minor, after which the original key and subjects are resumed.

Next comes a quartet for the four solo voices, 'Who knoweth the power of Thine anger?' Character is given to it by an insistent figure of accompaniment, which is almost continuous throughout the movement:

Here will be noted in the bass an insistent recurrence of the trombone figure already pointed out (No. 8). The above quotation (No. 13) is the first bar of the introduction, which soon modulates into F minor, the main key of the quartet, the lines of which are not so complex as to need any guide for their appreciation.

We now have an important double chorus a cappella—that is, unaccompanied—an interesting specimen of the composer's skill in contrapuntal choral writing. The choirs are used in many ways, but chiefly in responsive phrases, of which the first may be quoted:

Ex. 14.

CHORUS II.

A second section is in the key of B flat, in 4 measure, and in rather quicker time: Allegro non troppo, semiquaver divisions enlivening the effect; the chorus ends with a resumption of the style of the former section: 'Give thanks, then, unto the Lord.'

In a recitative accompanied by a continuous semiquaver figure, the contralto soloist tells how Moses, before his death, is bidden to write down a song, and teach it to the children of Israel. 'The Song of Moses,' as it is styled, is then (after a short introductory declamatory passage, interspersed with arpeggios for the harps) sung by the baritone soloist, the choir repeating each section in turn after him, and finally singing the whole of the song without his prompting. The opening phrase will suffice to indicate the character of this melody, which has the swing of a folk-song together with some measure of Semitic character:

It is accompanied throughout by running crotchets.

Without further preface than a chord, the tenor soloist begins the Third Part with a recitative, accompanied by the organ. Then the contralto follows, and we are told how Moses ascends the mount from which he regards the Promised Land that he himself may not tread, and at the words 'The Lord shewed him all the land,' we shall recognise the reappearance in the orchestra of the 'Promised Land' figure (No. 3). The soloist's words are echoed by the choir, and after another short solo for the tenor, we have the last words of Moses, submitting himself to God's judgment; a solo opening thus:

As he 'lifts up his eyes unto the hills' there is a recurrence of the 'Promised Land' figure (No. 3) in the accompaniment. Then there is a change to Allegro non troppo, 2, and the solo ends in a mood of restful confidence with a concluding Allegro moderato:

Ex. 17. Allegro moderato.

In a solemn recitative, intoned on three descending semitones, the tenor tells of Moses's death, and to an insistent, dirge-like, one-bar phrase in the orchestra, of the mourning of the Israelites, whose lamentations are expressed in a short unaccompanied chorale, based on the opening theme of the Prelude (No. 1).

Then we come to the final movement, in which both quartet and choir are concerned. It opens with a long pedal, first on G, the subdominant of the key in which the Finale is cast, on which the voices of the quartet build up a sort of exordium. Then the pedal note changes to the dominant, and the double choir enters with a phrase treated imitatively:

The same rhythm continues throughout some responsive phrases for the two choirs, which lead to the main section of the Finale, which in its first phrases is treated antiphonally, the second choir singing to solid harmonies 'And now O Israel, what requireth the Lord of thee?' to which the first choir responds, 'To fear the Lord thy God, to walk in all His ways,' and so on. Here, by the way, we shall notice in the orchestra the chromatic theme of the fugue in the Prelude (No. 2)

His consistency in this direction also renders it somewhat difficult to read his music with facility, especially as these augmented fourths are constantly recurring as bases of his chord structure. One of the principal forms of his distribution of the thirteenth in the seventh Sonata is the following, taking the root as C :

Here and throughout it will be noticed, curiously enough, considering its innate respectability, it is the thirteenth itself that provides the pungent element of discord, although it can take on considerable vitality and suggestiveness when treated in the manner that immediately follows the preceding example. Following a method of procedure that is frequent in the work, the root C is suddenly transferred to its flattened dominant, or, as Scriabine has it, the F# :

Such a passage assumes in its character the existence of a major tonic chord. Indeed, it may have been remarked by the hyper-analytically disposed, that Scriabine's chord holds in its contents a major and two minor triads. In Ex. 20, for instance, we find :

and full play of these constituents is allowed in passages similar to the following :

OR :

In the principal melodic phrase of the Sonata, representing in all its aspects a second subject, the general aural disturbance is much reduced by the elimination of the sheerly discordant (as we understand it) constituents of the chord :

Ex. 27.

Avec une céleste volupté.

Here we have in a clear and common form some interplay between the minor and major ninth on the root G# (Ex. 28), and the surprise in the last bar of an inversion of a perfect thirteenth with the major fifth, in its simplest distribution, that is without the eleventh. A variation or, rather, elaboration of this second subject (Ex. 27) a note lower is practically a complete exemplification in its happiest dispensation of Scriabine's contribution to the colour-scheme of music :

An addition to the composer's ordinary material, after all, is the utmost that can be claimed for Scriabine's innovation. As a matter of fact, if all the curious combinations of sound giving these sonatas a special and individual significance were reduced to their lowest common denominator (not by any means a difficult task), the musical spirit that evolved them would be shorn considerably of its distinction, and we would easily be enabled to gauge the depth of its importance.

Music has arrived at a stage of development when working creative artists only attain some sort of recognition when they are most successful in concealing the tools of their workshop. Historical achievements provide no criteria for a healthy emulation, or even a healthy emotional appreciation. They are too well understood. To the inquiring, highly-strung, young, present-day minds, the splendid past, in the matter of fragrance, suggests nothing better than a beautiful bouquet of wax flowers, carefully cherished under glass. They are probably wrong, but the environment of their age assists the illusion, and all appeals to a sense of artistic proportion fall on unheeding ears.

When the wealth of harmonic innovations introduced by experimenters of the type of Scriabine and many of the wonderful workers in the field of musical development that have preceded him during the last decade or two are assimilated in a perfect whole, the musical genius we are all waiting for will make his appearance. But in anticipating the arrival of the man who will necessarily forget his medium for his matter, it is reasonable to pay due recognition to those pioneers who are busy clearing the path, even if their exhausting efforts are only confined to one little and particular corner of the way.

A novel choral festival will be held at the Crystal Palace on August 30. A National Brotherhood Fête, organized by the London Federation of Brotherhoods and kindred Societies, includes a concert to be given by a male-voice choir, numbering several thousands, and there will be choral and band competitions.

Occasional Notes.

It is gratifying to know that certain Continental composers have no monopoly in the manufacture of weird and unconventional harmonies. We have our Cyril Scott, who can hold his own in this field against the world. The most striking examples of his peculiar talent that we have come across lately are to be found in his 'Old songs in new guise' (Elkin & Co.). Here we have a tune we used to like, namely, 'Drink to me only with thine eyes,' and there is no mistake about the new guise. The setting, so far as the tune is concerned, is in the key of A flat, but we evade stating the key of the accompaniment. See how the great Scott paints the lily!

The G flat is used presumably because it would be too, too harsh to have the correct A flat in the melody against the A natural in the accompaniment. Yet it might have been possible to condescend to retain the A flat and alter the accompaniment. We timidly suggest that the A natural in the bass at * may be a misprint for A flat. We are not sure that we have selected the most moving bars as examples. Another, and perhaps more striking example of the composer's treatment is that to which the ancient round, 'Summer is acumen in' (we quote as printed) is subjected. See how the 20th century improves on the 13th!

Is this the limit?

A choral Festival, held on July 3 in the romantically situated Harlech Castle, North Wales, deserves special notice because it goes far to redeem the character of Welsh chorals who are supposed by some persons only to take interest in competing for large money-prizes, and do not seize the true educational spirit of the competitive idea. There is that ignoble side of Eisteddfodau, but it is not nearly so prevalent in Wales as some hasty generalisations would induce us to believe. At the Festival referred to there were over 2,000 singers, and there were no competitions and no prizes. The morning and afternoon sessions were devoted to combined singing of Welsh hymn-tunes and anthems, and individual choirs came forward and each sang part-songs and choruses. The evening concert consisted of a performance of one of the best of Welsh sacred cantatas, 'Gweddi Habacuc' (Habakkuk's prayer), by J. Ambrose Lloyd—father of Mr. C. Francis Lloyd, of Newcastle, who scored the work for orchestra—followed by Parts 1 and 2 of Haydn's 'Creation'. An efficient orchestra was provided, and the soloists were Miss Sybil Vane, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Richard Evans. The place was packed, and the singing was thrilling. The choir was a great instrument entirely under control of the conductor, Mr. Harry Evans. All this was accomplished without a combined rehearsal. There had been months of hard preparatory work, and the singers knew the music thoroughly and revelled in the performance. All the singers paid their own expenses and, as we have said, there was no prospect of monetary reward. Floreat Cambria!

In connection with the first performance of 'The Promised Land,' the new oratorio by Saint-Saëns, at the forthcoming Gloucester Festival, it will be of interest to state, on the authority of Dr. A. Herbert Brewer, that this will be the first occasion on which an important novelty from the pen of a foreign composer has ever been produced at one of the Festivals of the Three Choirs during the whole 190 years of their existence. We can only say that it is high time such a record was broken, and congratulate the Gloucester Stewards accordingly upon breaking it with so much éclat. The work itself, which is just published in vocal score by Messrs. Novello & Co., boasts other records. It is the first oratorio on classical lines that Dr. Camille Saint-Saëns has written during his long and distinguished career—for his early Biblical drama 'Le Déluge' was more in the nature of incidental music to a stage play than pure oratorio; and it is also the first work that he has composed as the direct setting of an English text.

It is evident from what may be called the earlier history of 'The Promised Land' that the subject of Moses has always had a peculiar fascination for Dr. Saint-Saëns. More than thirty years ago he asked his present librettist, Mr. Hermann Klein, to arrange the Biblical text for an oratorio to be called 'The Death of Moses,' to occupy an entire concert programme. This was done, and the composer was on the point of setting it to music when he learned that Rubinstein was bringing out an opera on the same subject. He forthwith abandoned the idea, and no more was thought of it until last summer. Mr. Klein then showed him an abbreviated version of the Mosaic narrative, dealing more especially with the incidents that led to the great Hebrew leader being denied permission to enter the Promised Land. This the French master at once accepted, despite his previous decision not to undertake the writing of another important work at his advanced age. He completed it (orchestration and all) in less than six months from the time it was begun, and is now looking forward with the utmost eagerness to the pleasure of conducting it in September at the Gloucester Festival.

Lovers of Thomas Hardy will regret to learn that an interesting character has passed away in the person of Harry Bailey, one of the typical Wessex folk who bulk so largely in Hardy's novels. He formed one of a group of Dorset fiddlers and figured in many of Hardy's works. He died at the age of seventy-seven in Whetstone's Almshouse, Dorset. This event reminds us that Hardy has always taken an interest in the music and dance of the country-side. There is 'Shepherd Fennel's dance' in 'Wessex tales,' and doubtless many remember the description of the village curate who sol-faced 'Onward, Christian soldiers.'

The Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts, given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood, begin on August 16 and take place on every week-day evening until October 25. The general plan differs in no way from that of previous years. Mondays will be Wagner nights; Wednesday programmes will contain symphonies other than Beethoven's; Fridays will be Bach-Mozart-Beethoven nights; Beethoven's Symphonies will be given in order, the choral portion of the ninth being omitted and the C minor being repeated on the last Friday; Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays will be 'popular' nights. Fifty-four vocalists and thirty-three solo instrumentalists have been engaged.

To estimate the comparative interest of the season's programme one turns to the works that are new to London, which are as follows:

* 'Shepherd's Hey,' arranged for orchestra	Percy Grainger
Fantasia on two popular Angevin Airs	Lekeu † Tone-poems, 'Twilight of the year' and
'Paradise Birds'	Cyril Scott
Pianoforte Concerto in F minor	Glazunov
Suite, 'The Wasps'	Vaughan-Williams
Suite, 'L'oiseau de feu'	Stravinsky
Suite, 'Siciliana'	Marinuzzi
* Variations on a Chinese theme	Eugene Goossens, jr.
† Prelude, 'The king's threshold'	Thomas F. Dunhill
Preludes to Acts 4 and 5 of 'Othello'	Harry A. Keyser
Suite, 'Le bal de Beatrice d'Este' ...	Reynaldo Hahn
† Sketch for orchestra, 'Tamineh' ...	Blair Fairchild
'Iberia'	Debussy
† Two orchestral sketches, 'Pensive twilight' and 'The dance of the wild Iravel'	Arnold Bax
Valse nobles et sentimentales	Ravel
† Violoncello concerto	Dorlay
Introduction and dance from 'King
Harlequin'	G. H. Clutsam
Overture, 'Dr. Merryheart'	Haverlag Brian
Aria from 'The sunken bell'	Zoellner
† Andante for wind instruments by Mozart, arranged by Percy Pitt
Suite for orchestra	Dohnányi
† Idyll	Eric Coates
Hymn to the rising sun	Richard Mandl
† Aria for strings	Percy Pitt
Ballade for pianoforte and orchestra ...	Fauré

* Conducted by the Composer. † First performance.

It is also announced that an Aria, 'Hört doch der sanften Flöten Chor,' for soprano, with obbligato of three flutes, from Bach's Birthday Cantata of August 3, will be given for the first time in England. In respect of unfamiliar music, it will be seen that the season is to be exceptionally fruitful.

British music occupies practically one-eighth of the season's programme. Apart from the production of new works, its principal contributions to these concerts are performances of Dr. Ethel Smyth's Overture to 'The Wreckers' on August 21, Mr. Julius Harrison's Variations on 'Down among the dead men' on August 28, Mr. Frank Bridge's Suite 'The Sea' on September 23, Mr. Ernest Austin's Variations on 'The Vicar of Bray' on October 9—these conducted by their composers—Mr. Hamilton Harty's 'Comedy-Overture,' Elgar's 'Enigma Variations' and first 'Wand of Youth' Suite, and frequent performances of Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's dance' and works by Percy Grainger.

Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony is to be done once, and his fourth and fifth Symphonies not at all! Other interesting omissions are Brahms's third Symphony—the first, second, and fourth are included—Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony and Schubert's 'Unfinished.' Strauss is represented by 'Don Juan,' 'Tod und Verklärung,' 'Till Eulenspiegel' (twice), 'Don Quixote' (twice), 'Ein Heldenleben,' 'Sinfonia Domestica,' the closing scene from 'Salomé,' and excerpts from 'Feuersnot' and 'Der Rosenkavalier.' On October 3 will be heard Sir Henry Wood's arrangement of Vitali's famous Chaconne for violin as an orchestral piece. The most popular composer is, of course, Wagner, with his ten special programmes. His name occurs one hundred and sixteen times. Others of the world's leading composers are drawn upon as follows: Beethoven, forty-one performances; Bach and Tchaikovsky, twenty-four; Saint-Saëns, twenty; Dvořák, seventeen; Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Brahms, sixteen; Liszt and Strauss, twelve; Weber and Berlioz, eleven; Handel, Schubert, Grieg, and Elgar, ten. The prices of season tickets are as before: one guinea for the promenade, three guineas for the balcony, four-and-a-half and five guineas for the grand circle.

'THE GIRL I LEFT BEHIND ME': THE ENGLISH POINT OF VIEW.

BY FRANK KIDSON.

In an article contributed by Dr. Grattan Flood to the May number of the Musical Times, strangely enough entitled 'Fresh lights on Old English Airs,' seeing the purport of it is to show that the air dealt with is not English, my published remarks upon the song and tune 'The girl I left behind me' are quoted and misquoted.

In justice to myself I must first clear the ground by repudiating statements which the article attributes to me. For example, neither in Grove's Dictionary nor elsewhere do I say that 'the earliest appearance in print of the tune under the title "Brighton Camp" is in The Gentleman's Amusement, circa 1810,' nor do I 'add' that 'the earliest printed version of "The girl I left behind me" is in a MS. book circa 1815.' I certainly do disclaim the Irish bull that makes the earliest printed version appear in a manuscript book! My real words which the article so unjustly misquotes are these: 'Original printed copies of the air appear under the title "Brighton Camp," and these not before the early years of the 19th century. One occurs in The Gentleman's Amusement, Book III., an oblong volume published by J. Balls, London, about 1810. In a manuscript circa 1815 in the writer's library, the air, without words, bears the better known name. The earliest copy of the words known to the writer is in a manuscript collection of songs bearing the date 1797 and apparently written down about that year' ('English Songs of the Georgian Period,' p. 339). In Grove's Dictionary (vol. v., p. 642) I say: 'The tune cannot be traced back to a printed copy earlier than the end of the 18th century, but there seems every likelihood that it has been traditionally current as a military marching air. Chappell, in "Popular Music," refers to a manuscript copy formerly in possession of Dr. Rimbault, in date about 1770; he fixes the date of the song as about 1758. The earliest copy of the words the present writer has seen is in his own library in a manuscript collection dated 1797 and undoubtedly written in that or a previous year . . . Under the title "Brighton Camp," the tune is found in The Gentleman's Amusement, circa 1810, and elsewhere, and under "The girl I left behind me" in a MS. music book in the writer's possession, circa 1815.' It will be noticed by these extracts that I do not fix the 'earliest appearance' at any date, neither do I 'of course' 'endeavour to uphold Chappell's view' beyond that I, with Chappell, who has a great many able judges on his side, fail to see any Irish characteristics in the melody.

I submit that the article by Dr. Grattan Flood has let in no further 'light' on the subject, and that the whole question rests where it did. It was Mr. W. J. Lawrence who, in the Musical Antiquary of October, 1911, first made public the fact that the song and tune as 'The girl I left behind me,' appeared in Exshaw's Magazine for September, 1794. Although Dr. Grattan Flood says that its appearance in a Dublin magazine 'points more definitely to an Irish origin than anything yet discovered, and corroborates the Irish ascription,' yet on examination of the list that Mr. W. J. Lawrence gives of the musical contents of Exshaw's Magazine from 1743 to 1794, it will be seen that, with a very few exceptions, the whole are merely reprints of current English songs sung at the Public Gardens and elsewhere. Also it is a fact that of the fifteen musical items which are used in the Magazine for 1794, besides a few dances, chiefly Scottish, the rest are songs by Dibdin, one by Shield, 'Richer's hornpipe,' and 'The girl I left behind me.'

Dr. Grattan Flood makes one statement which may be remarked upon: 'The fact is that the tune was known in Ireland in 1780 under the Irish name of "An Spailpin Fanach," and it has all the well-known characteristics of an Irish air. Furthermore, the English song of "The girl I left behind me" was of Irish provenance and written by an Irishman about the year 1792, or perhaps earlier.'

It will strike any reader that herein lies the crux of the matter. Dr. Grattan Flood occupies a whole page of the Musical Times in discussing side-issues instead of at once producing documentary proof of this sweeping assertion, which is valueless unless supported by such evidence. If the words were 'written by an Irishman,' who was the Irishman? And if the tune to Irish words was current in Ireland in 1780, what proof can Dr. Grattan Flood furnish of this? Until both these questions are answered, with satisfactory proof adduced, the whole thing remains as before. I may add that the mere fact of a different tune appearing in Cahusac's dances for 1794, under the title 'Brighton Camp,' has little or no bearing upon the matter. It indicates either that a country dance tune has been named after the Camp and independently of the song, or that its title has been given in error. It is a fact that in the same publisher's 'The Modern Harp and English Guitar Preceptor,' which was certainly issued in 1801 or 1802, the tune 'Brighton Camp' is present, and this in the well-known version, 'The girl I left behind me,' while a specimen of Cahusac's misnaming is also existent in the fact that the popular 'Rising of the lark' is given the title 'Nos Galen,' thus confusing two well-known Welsh airs. The version of 'Brighton Camp,' as given here by Cahusac, is exactly the same as that which appears some years later in The Gentleman's Amusement, and which is reproduced by me in 'Songs of the Georgian Period.' Its curious variation from the commonly known version of 'The girl I left behind me' is noteworthy, and as a 'fresh light' it is here subjoined :

IMPRESSIONS AND OPINIONS.

BY GERALD CUMBERLAND.

Economy in art is the last lesson to be learned by even our greatest singers. They waste their powers in every direction: in effort, gesture, expression, tone, and dramatic force, they make poor bargains, giving a great deal for a very small return. One constantly hears huge vocal organs being used with a reckless prodigality that is amazing; they make so much noise, indeed, that one cannot hear what they say. 'Big voice, little brain,' is a saying that is true uncomfortably often. Certainly the most intelligent, the most impressive, and the greatest singers in the world are those whose voices cannot compare for one moment with the magnificent organs of Madame Melba and Signor Caruso.

Madame Yvette Guilbert's voice is almost negligible. Its 'quality' is ordinary; its volume is small. In its highest register, it is thin and almost unpleasantly plaintive. Indeed, in the throat of an ordinary person, it would scarcely be a voice at all; certainly it would never be a voice that could command the attention of Europe. But the voice is only a medium of expression: it is not the voice that sings, but the brain behind it. Just as a great sculptor can fashion a fine work of art out of the crudest clay, so can a great interpretative artist make a song real and vivid and beautiful with a quite ordinary and insignificant voice.

From the technical point of view, Madame Guilbert's voice is not insignificant. For many years it has undergone the severest discipline, so that now it can at a moment's notice adapt itself to the finest shades of feeling, and can suggest the most remote and hidden emotions. There is nothing beyond its power. Not even Caruso, booming luxuriously his high A's, can suggest greater sensuous passion than Guilbert with her thin, strident voice. Caruso says more than he means; Guilbert says less than she feels, and, leaving something to the imagination of her listeners, overpowers them with their own power to collaborate with her. It is this power to compel an audience into unconscious collaboration that separates the singer of genius from him who has only talent.

In every art, of course, it is personality that, in the last resort, counts most of all. Every man has a combination of certain qualities and defects which differentiate him from all his fellows; it is the sum of these qualities and defects, combined with his outward appearance, his voice, manner, &c., that we call personality. Now, the interpretative artist is known from the rest of us by his quickness to respond to internal and external impressions; his intelligence is greedy, his imagination fluid, his nervous organism extraordinarily sensitive. He gives himself to his public continuously, and it is those artists who have the most to give that make the deepest and most permanent impression. Madame Guilbert's æsthetic nature is extraordinarily rich, and her mind is of a peculiarly intuitive type that makes it possible for her to understand human nature in its most diverse and contradictory manifestations. Most of us have only a limited understanding of people; that is to say, we can understand only those persons who are most like ourselves. Guilbert, it would seem, understands everybody; most of all, she understands herself. When you hear her sing one of the impudent, broad 'Chansons populaires' that she herself has collected and edited, you tell yourself that the thing is so wonderfully done that it would be impossible for her to do anything else. 'This,' you say, 'is palpably her own particular genre;' she does this so magnificently because she is like this herself.' Ten minutes later, however, she gives you a selection of 'Légendes Dorées,' in which scenes from the life of Jesus Christ are pictured with supreme pathos. What infinite pity is there in her gestures, in her voice, and in her facial expression! What deep humanity and understanding! 'This woman,' you say, 'has lived entirely in the past; she has occupied herself wholly with sacred subjects.' But again you are mistaken, for she sings to you a number of 'Chansons Pompadour,' a group of 'Jolies Chansons de France,' and a selection of 'Chansons du XVII^{ème} Siècle.' She belongs to no country and to no time; her imagination embraces all countries and all ages. Whatever she sings is done supremely well. It is impossible to perceive in what way anything could be bettered; impossible to imagine anything more real and vivid; impossible to withhold from her the last word of admiration.

In writing to me a few weeks ago, Madame Guilbert declared that she had given her whole life to her art, and that she never took a holiday. She works incessantly, both at life and at art: that is to say, she studies the world with the same assiduity and enthusiasm as she employs in her study of the means of expressing the world. One cannot have great art without a rich and generous life, and those who cloister themselves in the past can give us nothing of the present. It must not be imagined from what I have written that Guilbert does not know the value of restraint; all things considered, she is, perhaps, the most restrained of all our great artists. Never for a moment does she tear passion to tatters; rather does she hint and suggest and indicate. There is something Meredithian in the way that she continually eludes the common mind, in the manner in which she constantly evades the obvious. From her, the thing that is ordinary becomes rare, and it is for this reason that she can dare to portray people and scenes from which other artists would shrink in dismay. The irresponsible naughtiness of some of her songs becomes sheer beauty, because it is true and typical and yet restrained. She gives us the essence of emotion rather than its manifestation. Above all, she places implicit trust in your intelligence. She knows very well that you will understand either nothing at all or that you will understand everything.

The three recitals that Madame Guilbert gave at the end of June and at the beginning of July were but meagrely attended. In no capital of Europe does Guilbert receive such scant attention as she does in London. Yet she comes here in the height of the season, is well advertised, and gives us of her best; and of the few hundred who go to see and hear her, half at least are her own countrymen. Why is this? It is, perhaps, because we take her for granted, and having seen her once, believe we have plumbed the depths of her art, and think there is nothing more to learn. But most likely it is because her art is beyond our understanding, and that, after all, we are a nation of Philistines. England was the last civilised country to accept Wagner, to understand Rodin, to appreciate Nietzsche. Ten years hence, when Guilbert's powers are on the wane, we shall begin to discover her, and flatter ourselves on our artistic perceptiveness. But by then this great artist may become tired of courting a public she cannot wholly win, and remain for ever on the further side of the Channel. This would be just punishment for our sins of negligence, for she has been frequently to London, and as frequently she has been praised by the few: which perhaps is her highest reward, for when the English understand a work of art, that work is ruined.

A FINNISH FESTIVAL.

By D. C. PARKER.

It is one of the charms of music that a study of it leads us into realms unfrequented and picturesque. The production of 'Boris Godounov' has drawn the attention of the student to all the notable activities of the modern Russian school. The fascinating art of Karsavina has doubtless given to many their introduction to composers like Florent Schmitt. It is by keeping abreast of the times that one is able to maintain an interest in music in all its branches. Popular imagination is fond of associating music with the sun-baked South. To the poetical spirit Italy is the land of song, but this idea is sometimes dispelled by a brief visit to Milan and its neighbourhood. The casual observer is probably obeying a primitive impulse in thus bracketing the sun and the song. In Greece, Italy, and Spain the gods of earth and sky pour their gifts upon men in such profusion that it seems but natural that they should express their joy in a never-ending chorus of praise. The North, with its long winter and forbidding climate, appears at first sight to have nothing to offer against this, but the truth is that it has a life of its own.

These remarks were suggested by the announcement of a Musical Festival at Nyslott, in Finland, to be held from June 30 to July 6. The summer used to be an entirely dead season on the Continent. Opera houses are still closed, and orchestral concerts confined, for the most part, to popular watering-places. But of late Bayreuth has not been the only place where the musician could hear good music. Munich has attractions to offer. Last summer, 'Hänsel und Gretel' was given in the open air. In France the summer movement has become popular, and several prominent musicians, Saint-Saëns and Fauré among them, have taken an interest in the performances. The Finnish Festival of last month was arranged partly because of the success which attended the previous one of 1912. For musicians this year's event would prove doubly interesting, because it was associated with the name of Madame Aino Ackté, and it offered a unique opportunity of hearing the works of Finnish composers.

The programmes were certainly interesting. The conductor, Oskar Merikanto, is not unknown in London, and on their recent visit the 'Suomen Laulu' included his name in their repertoire. Among the works promised was his opera, in four acts, 'The Death of Eelina,' the principal rôle in which was to be taken by Madame Ackté. Among other features mentioned were a concert in the Cathedral, popular and symphony concerts, a folk evening, and a comprehensive competition for musical Societies in Finland. For those to whom Finland meant merely the popular aspect of Sibelius, this Festival would have great value.

Habitues of Bayreuth know well that half the charm of a visit is derived from the surroundings of that Bavarian village. The beauties of 'Siegfried' and 'Die Meistersinger' are intensified by walking through the country between the performances. To those to whom natural surroundings have an attraction, Finland has much to offer. It must, surely, be an inspiration to be in the land of runes and sagas, the country of the 'Kalevala,' a national epic as full of interest as the 'Iliad,' the 'Chanson de Roland,' or the 'Nibelung' myth. Here, in the midst of a thousand lakes, there is much to enchant the intelligent traveller. And that which was formerly a battleground for Slav and Scandinavian is now a country populated by a people with a passion for modern culture. Nyslott itself, with its ancient castle, has been called the Venice of the North. Those who visited it doubtless found that by their pilgrimage they learned much of modern Finnish music and saw some of the finest scenery in the north of Europe. And others who are interested in such things will probably take care that they do not miss a future opportunity of witnessing this northern music-making.

Church and Organ Music.

The new organ built for the Town Hall, Rochdale, by Messrs. Binns, of Leeds, was opened on July 9. On the following day Mr. Herbert Walton gave a recital. Below we give the specification of the instrument:

At the annual concert of the Leeds Parish Church Choir, held on July 1, a presentation was made to Dr. Bairstow in recognition of his excellent services as organist to the Church, which now cease on his appointment to York Minster. The gift took the form of plate, which was presented by Dr. Bickersteth, Vicar of Leeds.

Dr. Bairstow's successor is Mr. Willoughby Herbert Williams, at present organist of the American Episcopal Church at Dresden. Mr. Williams was born in 1873, and was for some time organist at the Temple Church, Bristol. He entered the Dresden Royal Conservatoire for a course of study, at the end of which he was induced to remain at Dresden by the offer of the appointment of 'Chor-Repetitor' at the Royal Opera House.

Any movement which promotes artistic and personal friendship, mutual influence, and solidity of aim among musicians, is to be welcomed. We are glad, therefore, to hear of the recent formation of the Edinburgh Society of Organists, and we wish the Society full membership and a useful life. The chief officers are the following: hon. president, Prof. Niecks; president, Dr. W. B. Ross; vice-presidents, Mr. T. H. Collinson and Mr. Alfred Hollins; treasurer, Mr. William Rae; secretary, Mr. James C. Lumsden, 69, Hanover Street, Edinburgh.

The thirteenth triennial Festival of the Worcester Church Choral Association took place at Worcester Cathedral on June 19. Twenty-seven choirs made a total of 900 voices. The anthem was Purcell's 'O sing unto the Lord.'

On June 22, a special service was held at the Parish Church, Barkingside. The choir, augmented to sixty voices, were conducted by Mr. Cuthbert Nunn in a service of song designed to illustrate the conversion of England to Christianity. Part of the music was specially composed by Mr. Nunn.

The North-East Cathedral Choirs Association held their annual Festival service in Ripon Cathedral on June 26. The programme was designed to celebrate the centenary of two prominent Englishmen—George Macfarren, whose Te Deum from the service in E flat was sung, and Henry Smart, who was represented by his 'Sing to the Lord a new song.' The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Dr. G. J. Bennett's setting in A. The conductor was Mr. C. H. Moody, organist of the Cathedral.

In connection with the Patronal Festival at the Parish Church, Brighton, a Service of Praise was held on July 3. Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' and Gounod's 'Send out Thy light,' were performed by the Parish Church Festival Choir, under the direction of Mr. Chastey Hector, with Mr. Frank Butler at the organ.

A quarterly meeting of the Huddersfield Organists' Association was held on July 12, at Woodside, the residence of the President, Mr. A. E. T. Hinchcliffe, who read a paper on 'The position of organists and choirmasters under the Workmen's Compensation Act.'

We have received the specification of an organ recently installed in Holy Trinity Church, Winnipeg, by the Canadian Pipe Organ Company, Quebec. We will endeavour to find space to reproduce it in our next issue.

A new one-manual organ has recently been erected in the School Chapel of St. Cyprian's, Eastbourne, by the Positive Organ Company. On Parents' Sunday, the organist, Mr. C. Lyndham Robinson, gave a short organ recital, when the new instrument was much admired.

RECITALS.

Mr. Herbert Walton, Rochdale Town Hall, July 10—Introduction and Variations on the Austrian Hymn, E. T. Chipp.
Dr. G. H. Smith, Sculcoates Parish Church—Andante Cantabile in G, S. S. Wesley.
Mr. W. F. G. Steele, Scots Church, Melbourne—Sonata No. 2, in C minor, Mendelssohn.
Mr. W. J. Comley, St. Clement's Church, Terrington—Choral Prelude on 'Rockingham,' Parry.
Mr. Arthur S. Manfield, Skelmorlie Parish Church—Toccata, Adagio, and Fugue in C, Bach.
Mr. Fred Gostelow, Luton Parish Church—Fantasie-Symphonique, Gostelow.
Mr. Paul Richard, Hinckley Parish Church—Pastorale, Recitativo, and Corale, Karg-Elert.
Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson, Central Mission, Halifax Place, Nottingham—Sonata in B minor, Op. 178, Merkel.
Mr. W. S. Walker, Union Street Wesleyan Chapel, Accrington—Harmonies du soir, Karg-Elert.
Dr. Caradog Roberts, Goppa, Pontarddulais—Funeral March and Hymn of Seraphs, Guilmant.

In cloisters dim the voices pealed, "Ho - mo - ce - a! Ho -

It remains only to add that Mr. Laptrap, with characteristic thoroughness and feeling for the fitness of things, has written a part for harmonium or organ, which adds very materially to the effect. We note that Madame Sarah Summerbee and Mr. Roderick Manktelow are announced to sing the song at all their engagements. This recognition by leading English vocalists of the good work of native composers is a welcome sign of the times.

'Possum Rag,' by H. Welford Dairies (Nestlé, Cowes).—The gifted organist of the City Temperance Church is well known as a successful writer of dance music. 'Possum Rag' bids fair to join his other successes in the repertoire of our mechanical street musicians. It is no small feat, this of writing strains that shall appeal to the least intelligent and the most criminal sections of the populace. Long may the composer's beneficent muse thus bring sweetness and light into the dark places of our teeming centres of population! We quote the final cadence as an instance of the genial conductor's originality in harmonizing a simple tune. The imitative character of the tenor part in the penultimate bar will not—indeed, cannot possibly—escape the observant reader. It is in such clever touches that the master hand reveals itself. Scholarship is like murder—it will out:

'Symphonic variations on an original theme,' for full orchestra, by Johann Thompson. (Witzig und Wittwenstand, Berlin).—It is with regret that we perceive Mr. Thompson to be under the necessity of going abroad to find a publisher for this splendid work. Splendid it is, in every sense of the term. A fine, broad theme:

with virility in its every note, skilfully varied, and richly scored, such, in few words, is a description of this, the composer's magnum opus. Among the many impressive passages with which the work bristles, we must mention specially the broad diatonic treatment of the theme which forms such a striking feature in the noble and sonorous Coda:

and the frenzied canonic treatment which follows:

Ex. 6.

Strings & Wood.

It is Mr. Thompson's ability to evolve such typically British strains as these,—great tunes, racy of the soil—that has made his name honoured in America, Europe, everywhere, in fact, but in his own country. But his day, even here, will come. As we go to press, we hear a whisper of a private subscription among his admirers to pay for a performance of this work at Queen's Hall during the coming season. So mote it be! And may we be there to hear!

'Rève d'Amour,' pour l'orgue, par Max Rigour (Bock & Pilsener, Munich).—A fine example of this craggy German genius. Herr Rigour is at his best in dealing with elemental subjects, and in this work we find the same stark, almost brutal, strength that has made his name one to conjure with. We quote the fine principal theme:

Ex. 7. Ses. Voix phenacetine.

'Symphonic variations,' by Ezra Reed (Dunces, Hay & Franter).—Mr. Reed in this work adds materially to his already high reputation as a composer of serious organ music. The theme is a contracted version of a well-known English air, further disguised by being put in the minor :

There are twelve variations, all full of the daring originality we expect from the composer. It may be of interest to give the opening of the more striking among the number. The fourth, for example, is a sombre movement, with a theme of three notes, derived from the first bar of the air, treated as an ostinato :

Ex. 9. Lento pesante.

The seventh is a delightfully piquant Scherzo, opening thus :

Ex. 10. Presto scherzoso.

The eighth is a striking example of Mr. Reed's audacity. We have the theme in G major, with an accompaniment in A? ! It sounds almost too bad to be true, so we quote the first six bars :

Ex. 11. Moderato. espress.

You will note that the tenor part gives us a free version of the theme, against its augmentation in the treble.

How the composer keeps this difficult business going for three pages can be ascertained only by the purchase of a copy. This variation alone is worth the price charged. It is full of a poignant, bitter emotion that reveals itself only after long, long acquaintance.

We are on plainer ground in the next variation, a simple movement called 'Prelude,' and calling for the use of Diapasons only :

No. 11 goes still further in the matter of simultaneous employment of different keys. The theme appears in G in the treble, with a canon in the 6th below in B major, while the pedal (which also dallies with the opening three notes) is in A? :

Ex. 13.

Our composer, however, has by no means exhausted the possibilities of his material, as we find in the twelfth—and last—variation. This can only be described as a contrapuntal tour de force. Double and triple fugues have been written often enough—perhaps more often than enough. It is left for Mr. Reed to give us a sextuple fugue. He keeps us in the dark as to his intentions, merely heading the variation with the word 'Fugue.' However, we find subject after subject introduced and duly developed, until after some fifteen pages of glorious polyphony we have a stupendous climax in which all the subjects are combined. They are labelled, too, and we find that they are without exception fragments of well-known airs, including that from which his theme was derived :

Ex. 14.

It will be noticed that here, as elsewhere, Mr. Reed shows himself able to combine themes not in the same key. The quotation from 'Rule, Britannia,' though in B $\flat$, goes quite amicably with its five companions, who are faithful to the key of G major. There are a few licences in the part-writing, but these merely serve to show that Mr. Reed despises the obsolete rules to which lesser men kow-tow. He may (and probably does) say with that other great composer, Mendelssohn (or was it Mozart?), 'Rules? Rules?? A bas the rules! They are all my very humble, obedient servants!'

Such music as this brings credit to the composer, profit (we hope) to the publisher, and glory to the Empire—an Empire (to quote the memorable words of one of the greatest of our statesmen, still happily with us) 'on which the sun never sets.'

In connection with the performances of excerpts from 'Parsifal' under Sir Henry Wood at the Coliseum, as a series of musical tableaux, an interesting and instructive booklet by Mr. Richard Northcott was issued and obtained a wide circulation. It contains pictorial representations of Mr. Byam Shaw's scenic designs, a concise and helpful description of the story and the music, from which thirteen themes are quoted, and a short history of the opera. The management and Mr. Northcott are to be congratulated on the production of this excellent aid to the understanding of the work.

Tschudi, the harpsichord maker. By William Dale, F.S.A.

This is a delightful book to see and still more to read. It relates in an attractive style the life history of Tschudi, the celebrated harpsichord maker, who for a time dwelt in Meard Street, off Dean Street, and later in Great Pulteney Street. Burckhardt Tschudi, or, as he afterwards anglicised his name, Burkhat Shudi, was the friend of Handel and the founder of the great house of Broadwood. He was born on March 13, 1702, at Schwanden, in the canton of Glarus, in Switzerland, where his father was a man of some importance. Burckhardt left his native valley in 1718, and came to London to try his fortune as joiner and cabinet-maker. He married Catherine Wild, the daughter of Jakob Wild, who had preceded Shudi in leaving Schwanden for London. He worked for Tabel, a well-known maker of harpsichords, and he was a fellow-workman with Kirchmann, who afterwards acquired Tabel's business. The story of his capture of this business, which is quoted in Mr. Dale's book, from Rees's 'Cyclopaedia,' shows that Kirchmann was not in the habit of wasting time. It runs as follows:

'Kirchmann worked with the celebrated Tabel as his foreman and finisher till the time of his [Tabel's] death. Soon after which, by a curious kind of courtship Kirchmann married his master's widow, by which prudent measure he became possessed of all Tabel's seasoned wood, tools, and stock-in-trade. Kirchmann himself used to relate the singular manner in which he gained the widow, which was not by a regular siege but by storm. He told her one fine morning at breakfast that he was determined to be married that day before twelve o'clock. Mrs. Tabel, in great surprise, asked him to whom he was going to be married, and why so soon? The finisher told her that he had not yet determined whom he should marry, and that if she would have him he would give her the preference. The lady wondered at his precipitancy, hesitated full half an hour, but he continuing to swear that the business must be done before twelve o'clock that day, at length she surrendered; and as this abridged courtship preceded the marriage act, and the nuptials could be performed at the Fleet or May Fair without loss of time or hindrance to business, the canonical hour was saved, and two fond hearts were in one united in the most summary way possible just one month after the decease of Tabel.'

Kirchmann became a rival to Shudi, the former claiming the patronage of the King, whilst Shudi enjoyed the patronage of the Prince of Wales. As Mr. Dale says, the most important factor in Shudi's success was his friendship with Handel, who was a constant guest at Shudi's table. It is this connection of Shudi with the great composer that led Mr. Dale to give a reproduction of the portrait of Handel, which, by the kindness of the Earl of Malmesbury, we also are able to reproduce and give to our readers as a special supplement (see p. 505). Soon after Shudi and his family removed to Great Pulteney Street, a picture of himself and family was painted. This is reproduced in Mr. Dale's volume, and we also are able to reproduce it by the kindness of Lieut. Evelyn Shudi Broadwood, the owner of the original. Mr. Dale says:

'Shudi is engaged in tuning a harpsichord, which is placed on a richly gilt stand, and is evidently something out of the way. He wears a flowing dressing-gown. His wife, Catherine Wild, takes her tea, and the two young boys stand near. The attire of all the family and their surroundings betokens a prosperous man. It was painted so as to fill a space in the panelling over the fire-place in the little front parlour of Shudi's house in Pulteney Street, and there it remained until some fifty years ago. Unfortunately the name of the painter is not known, and speculation has been rife.'

Mr. Dale gives reasons for supposing that the picture is by Mercier, and he states that it was painted about 1744. According to a family tradition, the harpsichord Shudi is tuning is one which he presented to Frederick the Great, in honour of the issue of the Battle of Prague; but this great event did not take place until 1757.

[Reproduced by kind permission of Lieut. Evelyn Shudi Broadwood.]

Amongst Shudi's apprentices was one Johann Zumpt, who became popular as a maker of small clavichord-like table pianofortes. Blume was another, and Joshua, a nephew of Shudi, was another, who became a somewhat troublesome rival. Shudi had two sons, one of whom died in 1754. The other, Burkat, carried on the business until the harpsichord ceased to be used. But the most notable of Shudi's alumni was John Broadwood, the young Scotsman born at Cockburnspath, who became Shudi's partner, and in 1769 married his only daughter, Barbara. It was in this year that Shudi took out his patent for the Venetian Swell, 'so much admired by all lovers of music.' Another chapter of Mr. Dale's book gives an interesting account of Shudi's aristocratic patrons.

Towards the close of Shudi's life the pianoforte was gradually but surely displacing the harpsichord. About 1772, Shudi retired to Charlotte Street, and the business was carried on by John Broadwood. Shudi died August 19, 1773.

Mr. Dale gives a list of twenty-three harpsichords by Shudi, and Shudi & Broadwood, known to exist. He gives the numbers of all except one dated 1729, and he states that additions to the list will be gladly welcomed. The numbers given are as follow: 144, 229, 260, 407, 427, 511, 512, 625, 639, 686, 691, 750, 762, 789, 862, 899, 902, 919, 955, 1137, 1148, 1155.

ORGAN MUSIC.

Short Choral Preludes. Vol. i., Nos. 1-3. Vol. ii., Nos. 4-5. By Ethel Smyth.
Meditation. By Alfred Hollins.
Cantique. By Edward Elgar.
Barcarolle. By Arthur W. Pollitt.
Marche Solennelle. By Tchaikovsky (posthumous).
 Arranged by James Lyon.

Dr. Ethel Smyth is best known as a writer of involved, rugged, and highly emotional orchestral music. In the works under review she has achieved simplicity, regular outline, and intellectual calm without sapping the strength of her style. The adjective 'strong' has been applied ad nauseam to her work; here, again, it is the only fit one to use as a general term. The Choral Preludes are written throughout in four real parts, and as is proper and necessary, the tonality is guarded. These restrictions, which place an unwonted control upon the composer's imagination, never seem to put her at a loss for a distinctive idea. There are few composers who can write living music in this form, and it is satisfactory to find that two of those who can do it well—and think it worth while—are British musicians. Patriotic organists who are jealous of their artistic standard have an opportunity to satisfy both claims by giving to these works the attention which they have shown to the choral preludes of Sir Hubert Parry.

In our constantly increasing store of light, unpretentious organ music the work of Mr. Alfred Hollins takes an honourable position. The estimable quality of his writing which has won this distinction is reproduced in his 'Meditation.' Here, too, we recognise the composer's familiar manner in the ease with which he swings us without a jolt into remote keys and out again without a hint of strangeness. Sir Edward Elgar's 'Cantique' is marked Op. 3, No. 1, and it is distinguished by the simplicity of his early writing. It has dainty melody, roundness of form, and is written almost entirely on the white notes of the keyboard. But beneath this unassuming exterior one can perceive the composer who has something to say. The piece embodies much of the art which conceals art. Dr. Arthur Pollitt's 'Barcarolle' is a piece of graceful writing suitable for the latter half of an organ recital. It is well and carefully worked out. Dr. Lyon has made an effective and useful arrangement of Tchaikovsky's little known march; it provides plentiful opportunities for 'showing off' an organ.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

The child's first steps in pianoforte playing. By Tobias Matthay.
The fore-arm rotation principle in pianoforte playing. By Tobias Matthay.

[Joseph Williams, London.]

When Mr. Tobias Matthay first published his work, 'The act of touch,' in 1903, it was received with very mixed feelings by the musical profession. Many scoffed at the mere fact that an acknowledged expert required some 300 pages of closely-printed matter to explain how to play the pianoforte; others regarded the book as a 'one-man's fad' which would have its day and be gone; others indignantly denied that anything could be wrong with existing methods which had produced a Liszt, a Rubinstein, a Madame Schumann. But the wise, even if unable to grasp a tithe of the new gospel at first, recognised the fact that here was something giving food for thought and experiment.

And now? The 'one-man's fad' has within ten short years altered radically the whole system of modern pianoforte teaching. The Matthay Principles, Matthay Doctrines, Matthay Methods, call them what one may, are known the world over, and probably never before in art has an almost world-wide revolution been accomplished in so short a space of time. Truly of art did Schumann say, 'Es ist des Lernens kein Ende.' Since 1903 Mr. Matthay has issued other works; but most likely one of the most interesting, from the teacher's point of view, will prove to be his latest—'The child's first steps in pianoforte playing.' Here we have the author's precepts clearly and very simply laid down, in language such as any child out of the kindergarten should be able easily to understand. The little work is not a pianoforte tutor in the usual sense of the word; but it can be taken hand in hand with such an admirable work, say, as Mrs. Curwen's 'Child pianist'; or any similar publication—if one can be found!

In the 'First steps' the child has explained to him just what he needs to know, and no more, about the mechanism of the instrument; how to manipulate the keys; how to obtain true piano and forte effects; about arm-weight; using the fore-arm 'rotatively'; the difference between staccato and legato; turning the thumb under; and many other necessary points. The book is recommended to all teachers, and specially to those, let us hope now in a small minority, who have not yet made acquaintance with Mr. Matthay's works.

In another recently issued pamphlet—'The fore-arm rotation principle'—Mr. Matthay explains fully, and perhaps more simply than hitherto, the application and mastery of this leading doctrine in his interpretation of the 'Act of touch.' The present booklet is equally suitable for study by the pupil or the teacher, and will be found useful to those who have not the author's larger works at hand.

Pianoforte technics for the Medium Grade. By Franz Müller.

[Weekes & Co.]

There is much to commend in this work. Too often young people think that there is no need for technical exercises after the early days. Perhaps examining bodies are somewhat answerable for this notion. If they require no technical exercises after the Lower Grade, if Higher, Intermediate and Advanced Certificates can be gained without them, why trouble? But the wise teacher knows that they are indispensable, not only in student days but throughout one's life, if technique is to be kept up to a high standard. Those who have worked through 'Schmitt,' and do not need to be dosed with the large works more suitable for professional students, will find these Technics just what they want. They are well up-to-date, simple (easily read and grasped at first sight), and of pleasing variety.

The Ascherberg Pianoforte School. Compiled by Thomas F. Dunhill and W. A. Volk.

[Ascherberg, Hopwood & Crew, Ltd.]

This new publication is in several books, containing a series of graded exercises, studies, and pieces; they will be found especially suitable for those preparing for the School Examinations of the Associated Board. Already six books are ready in Series I. for the Primary Division and eight books in Series II. for the Elementary Grade. Besides much new material, of an excellent and highly appropriate character, the books also contain a good sprinkling of well-established and favourite studies and pieces by the classic composers, upon whose works the Associated Board most often rely for their selections.

Mes Souvenirs. Jules Massenet.

[Pierre Lafitte et Cie., Paris.]

To those interested in modern opera this volume should make a strong appeal. Massenet might doubtless have written in greater detail of such celebrities as Liszt and Verdi; but the book, as it stands, is an interesting record. The present work gives ample proof of Massenet's popularity in France. He had many friends, and this is not surprising if he was as approachable as these pages indicate. In spite of this, he managed to get through an extraordinary amount of work. Indeed, one gathers from his souvenirs that he was not happy unless writing—even when ill and in bed. Those who expect to find the keen sense of observation and the fine critical faculty of Saint-Saëns will be disappointed. But any who are eager to know something of a phase of modern operatic activity of which we in England know little will find the book worth reading. Massenet's souvenirs are as graceful as his music, and quite characteristic of the man.

Music to Shakespeare's Plays: A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Tempest. Selected and arranged for the use of schools and colleges. By R. Dunstan.

These handy collections of Shakespearean music form part of Novello's School and College series. It is safe to say that they will be welcome in that rapidly expanding educational circle where good music and good literature are co-ordinated. Dr. Dunstan is an earnest and careful editor, and in these books he has taken great pains to bring together and arrange for easy performance much music that was scarcely obtainable in any other form. There are eight numbers in the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' two of which are taken from Mendelssohn's beautiful setting and the remaining six are traditional music by various known and unknown composers. The collection of music for performance with 'The Tempest' is a shorter one, although it comprises twelve numbers, Purcell, Bannister, R. Johnson, J. C. Smith, Shield, Stevens, Arne, and other composers being drawn upon. There are also three traditional country dances that have been simply arranged by Dr. Dunstan. Both books give a list of other settings of words for the plays.

ENGLISH AND GERMAN ORGANS.

SIR,—Attention has recently been drawn (in the Musical Times and other musical journals) to the respective claims to superiority of English and German organs. Much has been said on both sides—with particular reference to the new organ at St. Michael's, Hamburg, and the proposed instrument for Liverpool Cathedral—but much has apparently been left unsaid.

Allow me to make the preliminary observation that I do not believe that German instruments are superior to English as regards their tonal scheme. English organs exhibit a greater variety of tone-colour as a rule, with an 'ensemble' better than German instruments with an equal number of stops; and the distinctive character of the Pedal organ (pipes of which are of larger scale generally) in itself constitutes an important claim to superiority. On the other hand, there appears to be a tendency at the present time (among some English builders) to make the Diapason-work of thinner metal and smaller scale than was customary some forty or fifty years ago—an unwise economy which has to be guarded against.

So far as I am aware, however, little detail has been given in the various articles and correspondence which have recently appeared on the subject—concerning the mechanical 'accessories' and means of control of modern German instruments, which are, I believe, remarkably perfect, and worthy of careful attention on the part of English builders. I will mention a few organs in Berlin which I believe to be typical examples, of any or all of which it would be interesting to have particulars—especially relating to the systems of control.

The Dom, and also the Kaiser-Wilhelm-Gedächtnis Kirche (Charlottenburg) have very large instruments, and very fine organs are also possessed by the Garnison-Kirche (Neue-Friedrichstrasse) and the Marienkirche (near the Dom). Also it may interest English organists to know that the American Church (in Motzstrasse, near Nollendorf Platz) possesses a rather small three-manual organ which is provided with remarkable systems of control, that I may be permitted briefly to describe. Rocking tablets are used instead of draw-stops, and immediately above each are placed two small draw-pistons, each stop being thus virtually in triplicate. Buttons marked '1' and '2' respectively throw the first or second set of stops into action (this is our Willis Patent), the rocking tablets remaining set as at first. The player therefore can prepare his organ in three different ways—over the entire registration of the organ, and use either at will without changing stops. There are also pistons placed above each manual giving varying degrees of tone, with or without a suitable Pedal bass to each, and below the lowest manual (the Great on German instruments) are a number of pistons operating over the whole instrument (all manuals coupled—ppp to fff). These pistons do not alter the set arrangement of the tablets—i.e., the latter do not therefore indicate the true state of the organ when the pistons are used (a trifling disadvantage—if a disadvantage at all—enormously exaggerated by opponents of the 'Ventil' system). There are a number of other accessories, of which I cannot now remember all. There are no Pedal pistons, but three balanced swells and a Crescendo pedal.

The couplers are very complete, including Pedal octave coupler, and Sub- and Super-Octave couplers to the Great! Now I come to the most remarkable feature of this instrument, the like of which I have not seen or heard of in this country, viz., a piston called 'Koppel.' It is a Manual-to-Pedal self-acting coupler. When this piston is impressed the organ thinks for itself in this respect, coupling the first, second, or third manual to Pedal as required. English organs have all kinds of devices to facilitate the 'Great-to-Pedal on and off' difficulty, but nothing, so far as I am aware, so complete as the 'Koppel' piston. I would like to mention also—to allay any possible doubts on this point—that I ascertained that this device is perfectly reliable and never fails to act promptly. Thus, for instance, directly the hands touch the Choir keys the Pedal couples to Choir, Swell or Great going off immediately; and if one should at the same time play a solo on the Swell or Great it makes no difference. In fact, if one plays two notes on one manual and three or four on another, that manual on which the larger number of notes are being played will immediately couple to the Pedal organ, other manuals going off. The organist is of course perfectly free to dispense with this device and manipulate the couplers in the usual way.

To those unacquainted with the device explained above it should be a revelation. Altogether, the possibilities of the 'Ventil' system, in its modern electro-pneumatic perfection, seem to be remarkable, and its claims to consideration have, it appears, yet to be reckoned with.

Some of the Crescendi and Diminuendi in Reger's music, which perhaps appear almost impossible in performance, would certainly be much simplified by the up-to-date means of control of modern German instruments—which I have only just touched upon.

Most of the fine instruments in Berlin are, I believe, by the builders Sauer, of Frankfurt a/Oder; but the organ in the American church is, I believe, by another maker.

I trust that the above remarks may not be without some interest to readers.

SONATAS AS VIOLIN TESTS.

SIR,—It is surely high time that a protest be made against the practice of including sonatas for pianoforte and violin in the lists of examination test-pieces for violin.

It will not be disputed by those who have taken advantage of their opportunities of observation, that the average member of an average concert-audience does not know the difference between a solo violin piece, with a pianoforte accompaniment, and a joint-sonata which elevates the pianoforte from the accompanimental status to the level of co-operating soloist.

Chamber-music of this class is held to stand apart in that its artistic performance depends largely upon a complete psychological understanding between the performers, and it would not be going too far to say that it is at least advisable, if not imperative, that performers should experience a personal intercourse sufficient to promote an insight into and a sympathy with each other's temperamental individuality before undertaking a joint or mutual interpretation of a masterpiece of chamber-music. The earnest student is in the habit of regarding chamber-music as a sort of inner sanctuary, admission to which is only granted to those whose power of self-effacement entitles them to artistic consideration.

The attitude of the examining bodies concerned ignores the necessity of enlightening the uninitiated as to the real nature of the joint-sonata, and encourages the tyro-violinist to regard a duet as a piece for one instrument accompanied by another.

The suggestion that the performance of the violin part of, say, a Brahms joint-sonata with the casual assistance of a perfect stranger at the pianoforte is a proper test of a candidate's musicianship is surely indefensible.—Obediently yours,

M. MONTAGU-NATHAN.

A CORRECTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—In the very kind notice of my small organ piece 'Jour de nocces' in a recent issue, your critic takes exception to my using the tremulant with the swell super-octave coupler. This is a little error on his part, for the only time the tremulant is used (in the second part of the middle section), he will find it is the swell sub-octave coupler that is indicated.—Faithfully yours,

J. STUART ARCHER.

'THE FUTURE OF CHAMBER MUSIC.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In the September number (1912) of the Musical Times, there was a very suggestive paper by Mr. Rutland Boughton on 'The future of chamber music.' In it he suggested the possibility of programme music for the chamber—to associate the forms of chamber music, and especially the string quartet, with definite ideas laid down by title or emotional programme: to write, in fact, tone-poems for concerted music in chamber. Also to give to chamber music vocal and even (in a quiet way) dramatic value. In conclusion, Mr. Boughton wrote: 'I do not apologise for thus referring to my own works in this matter because, apart from Dr. Walford Davies, no other composer known to me has followed any definitely new line in this branch of music.'

It may be interesting to Mr. Boughton and many of your readers to learn that the well-known New Zealand composer, Mr. Alfred Hill, whose Maori Symphony has been performed at the Crystal Palace, has been working on the lines suggested by Mr. Boughton for some years.

The Austral String Quartet party, headed by Mr. Cyril Monk, of Sydney, have brought forward several works of chamber programme music by Alfred Hill. Among the works of this class written by this composer there are two Maori String quartets descriptive of Maori legends, which legends, by the way, are full of poetic beauty. And there are two scenes for bass voice, string quartet, and pianoforte, descriptive of a hot, languorous day in Australia, and the coming of the cool south wind, the words of which are as follows:

SUMMER HEAT.

All is still ; not a breath of air in motion,
The blood-red orb glares down on a burnt-up world.
All life is pulseless; birds and flowers and man.
The locust alone drums out his tuneless note,
And makes the silence more profound.

THE SOUTH WIND.

Did you feel it? Was it fancy? List again!
The air is stirring; see the leaves a-rustle,
Blown by the faint breeze,
'Tis the South Wind—
God! how sweet, how fresh, how cool,
'Tis very life, 'tis life, 'tis life.

The music of this work is full of colour. A later and more important work is a Quintet for strings and pianoforte, with eight solo voices, to which a celesta and organ are added in the last movement. It is called 'Life,' and the idea is to convey the mystery, the yearning to know, the struggles, the pleasures of life; and, finally, to break out in a pean of joy for life, despite all its difficulties.

Herr Knoch, conductor for the Quinlan Opera Company, who was present at a performance of the work in Sydney, was most enthusiastic about the effect this composition made upon him, but he objected to the programme being given to the audience.

It will be seen from the foregoing that Alfred Hill has the same ideas as Rutland Boughton. He found that by labelling his themes he got more meaning into his music from the players, and a hint to the public set their imagination at work and certainly aroused more interest than when there was no 'key to the problem.'—I am, yours sincerely,

'LA DU BARRY.'

The one and only novelty of the French and Italian season at the Royal Opera was brought to a hearing on July 3. It consisted of what was ingeniously described as 'a series of pictures' from the life of the famous (or notorious) Madame Du Barry, the mistress of Louis XV. The musician who thus distinguishes himself by being the first of his craft to apply his muse to this frail creature is Signor Ezio Camussi, who is thirty years of age. This fact should be borne in mind. Our musician is thirty. Verdi, who also did something in the direction of opera, was world-famous by that time. So far echo has not resounded with the name of Camussi. London certainly has not echoed it from Milan, where the work was produced with immense success last November. The reason may be that London has come to look for dramatic music from Young Italy. She listens in vain this time. Signor Camussi has not yet learned to be dramatic. And there are some moments that might be dramatic in the four pictures that make the opera. The first is at Luciennes in 1773: Louis still free from small-pox and La Du Barry beginning to get on very well with the Duc de Brissac. The next turn of the wheel shows the meeting of these two at the Trianon as part of a pretty hustling scene with the 'real' properties that dear Augustus Harris loved so well. Then we are shown the Abbey of Pont aux Dames. This means a fugato, which would not even be commended 'for ability' by the examiners in music in the University of Oxford. Then follows a really pretty scene between the novices and La Du Barry, and a duet in the best modern Italian style, in which the composer gives another of the hints already made of future distinction. Finally history jumps on to the last days at Luciennes in 1792, when, as every good student of French history knows, the ex-favourite of the King of France lost her head in more senses than one. The description of the work as being 'pictures' disarms any charge of incoherence in the story, and incidentally removes any possibility of dramatic effect. It is all very pretty and nicely coloured, like the frescoes on the walls of an Italian restaurant: but to continue the simile, one looks in vain for anything that is sustaining. There are some charming moments in the music. Signor Camussi shows a graceful lyrical touch at many points; but when it comes to putting in heavy shadows his hand fails him and he daubs with tar. Yet though he does not succeed in convincing, yet he imports a something into his music that makes one hopeful for the future. It would be no matter of surprise if, in say five years' time spent in study and self-criticism, Signor Camussi were to burst upon the world with a really fine opera. The performance was good. There were many factors in it. Mr. Harry Brooke, who painted the scenery, comes first. The view he gives of the Trianon, and his 'built up' of the Abbey, are triumphs of that but sub-consciously appreciated art. The casting was well enough. There was not much of the charm one supposes La Du Barry to have possessed, and Madame Edvina rather revealed a lack of body in her tone, as well as gave an impression by her facial expression that the Favourite was short-sighted. Signor Martinelli sang earnestly as the Duc de Brissac. Signor Sammarco as a Major domo of dusky hue, and given to wearing a fearful and wonderful turban, had little to do, but did it well. Jean du Barry was introduced, and was made tolerable by M. Crabbe's admirable art, and Cazotte (M. Huberdeau) was also heard to prophesy a bad end for his hostess, La Du Barry. Louis is seen but not heard. Signor Panizza conducted well, and the composer was summoned before the curtain.

GENERAL RÉPERTOIRE.

After being 'left dry,' as the term is, for four years, Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' has been mounted. This erstwhile mainstay of any operatic enterprise was warmly received. The present generation—the one that was of an opera-going age four years ago—has seen better performances. Mozart would seem to be in danger of being shouted down by Wagner. The greater part of the music was vociferated. The Don was M. Rouard, one of this season's new-comers. He made the Don a stylish individual, rather inclined to what the vulgarian of the day would term 'swank.' He seemed haunted, and therefore unable to keep still. It was a good attempt at a reading of the part, but it was only an attempt. Madame Destinn was the Donna Anna, Mlle. Stralia (well-known in Australia as Miss Fischer) did well on her first appearance on the stage. She provided something novel in her Donna Elvira, as she was able to sing the music, though her voice is somewhat on the powerful side. Miss Mignon Nevada gave us much of the fragrance of Zerlina. Her voice must be likened to good wine, since time will do much to mature it. Signor Aquistapace (Leporello), Signor Malatesta (Masetto), Signor Marvini, a fine resonant bass from France, as the Commendatore, and Mr. John McCormack as Don Ottavio, completed the cast. Signor Polacco was the conductor.

The rest has been repetition, but not in vain. The public apparently like modern Italian opera, and they had it. Walking into the house without looking at the bill one could be sure that the opera was either 'La Tosca' or 'Madama Butterfly.' The French 'Louise' and 'Samson et Dalila' have come in for a good share, and 'Aida' seems to have taken a new lease of life, constituting a sort of automatic observation of the centenary of its composer's birth. In this work M. Paul Franz has distinguished himself by his fine version of the tenor music. Save for Madame Melba, who knows the bel canto, the 'Rigoletto' cast was not remarkable. Madame Destinn has for the first time sung the part of Santuzza in Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' and Signor Martinelli has shown fine temperament and vocal resource in its companion in misfortune 'I Pagliacci.' As the month and the season near their end, Gounod's 'Romeo and Juliet' is announced, with Madame Melba and Mr. McCormack, with their Majesties The King and Queen as spectators.

FRANCIS E. BARRETT.

THE CARILLON AND ITS MUSIC.

On Saturday afternoon, July 5, under the auspices of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, a lecture was given by Mr. W. W. Starmer, the well-known authority on matters of tone and tune of bells, in the tuning room of Messrs. Taylor's foundry at Loughborough. The prelude to the lecture was the casting of a peal of bells, after which Mr. Starmer proceeded to deal with his subject, 'The carillon and its music,' pointing out that there is no difficulty whatever in proving that the perfection of the bell as a musical instrument is and always has been the chief aim of all the great masters of the art of bell-founding. In England there was a time when the particular weight of a bell and the mechanical requirements for its hanging and ringing were considered more important than its musical tone or tune. Now, however, things have changed, for at the present moment the different harmonic tones in every bell—covering a range of at least two octaves—can be controlled and adjusted with the minutest accuracy, notwithstanding the complex relationship of these tones to each other. The lecturer then proceeded to give an analysis of the tones of two bells tuned on the different systems, and by means of tuning-forks mounted on resonance boxes, successfully demonstrated the great superiority of the method by which the whole of the tones within the compass of two octaves are brought into perfect consonance with each other. A concise description of the mechanism of the carillon was given.

The lecturer pleaded specially for the carillon and its use in promoting the love for and the knowledge of folk-music, in addition to its unique characteristics as a musical instrument. The position of the instrument in most instances enabled an audience consisting of the inhabitants of a whole city to hear music as well as the very limited audience of a concert-room.

It was to be regretted that in England the most artistic bell music was impossible, as there did not exist a carillon of sufficient weight to demonstrate satisfactorily the capabilities of the instrument. An ideal place for such a carillon would be the clock tower of the House of Commons, or in the grounds of the Crystal Palace, where this delightful bell music could be heard to its best advantage. The lecture concluded with some fine examples of carillon music on a carillon of forty bells erected in one of the towers in the foundry, first by M. J. van Beers, of Brussels (a very promising pupil of M. Josef Denyn), who played the following programme with excellent effect:

'The thorn'	Shield
'Brise de nuit,' Romance	D'Hach
'Naar oostland zullen wy ryden'
'Van twee conincs kinden' (vieilles chansons flamandes)	F. van Duyse
'De vlamsche leeuw,' Marche	Miry

After this M. Denyn himself took the clavier, and as an introduction to his well-chosen programme, gave an extempore prelude in the form of a toccata in which chromatic runs, arpeggios, chords, trills, &c., were executed with marvellous rapidity and clearness. Throughout, M. Denyn played with rare executive skill, well-defined rhythm, and fine expression. We expect all this from such a renowned player, but on this occasion he excelled himself, and completely accomplished his task of showing to English musicians the artistic possibilities of his instrument, on which, without doubt, he is the greatest living artist. His programme was:

'March of the men of Harlech'
'Allan Water'
'Old King Cole'
'Rondo,' from Sonata No. 4	Nicolai
'Lob der Thänen'	Schubert
'Frühlingsglaube'
'Grazioso,' from Sonata No. 1	Richter
'Zuivere liefde'	Peter Benoit
'Erste Fantasia'

PRESENTATION TO MR. W. W. STARMER.

All the world knows Mr. Starmer as a distinguished authority on bells and carillons, but his musical record in other directions is not so familiar to the public. Mr. Starmer resides at Tunbridge Wells, and for twenty-five years he has been organist and choirmaster of St. Mark's Church in this attractive town. Another of his activities has been the direction of that very successful Choral Society, the Tunbridge Wells Vocal Association, established in 1863, and which he has conducted for twenty-one years. This coming-of-age was duly recognised by the presentation of an address and a sum of 53 guineas subscribed for by 150 past and present members.

The musical record of the Society under Mr. Starmer's régime as conductor is a proud one. In addition to the well-known works of the old masters they have given for the first time in this part of England no less than thirty-eight works by English composers: Elgar (5), Cowen (3), Stanford (2), Parry, Sullivan, Edward German, Coleridge-Taylor, Macfarren, Sterndale Bennett, &c. All these works have been performed in first-rate style with an adequate orchestra and the best soloists.

DRURY LANE.

It is gratifying to record that Sir Joseph Beecham's bold enterprise in importing an entire Russian company for a five weeks' season of Russian opera and ballet has met with brilliant success. The three operas produced, 'Boris Godounov' and 'Khovanstchina,' by Moussorgsky, and 'Ivan the Terrible,' by Rimsky-Korsakov, have especially met with almost unbounded favour. At the close of the full and very interesting article on Moussorgsky's operas which Mrs. Rosa Newmarch contributed to the July Musical Times she says:

'In France they [the Moussorgsky operas] seem to have found permanent anchorage; whether they will sail into the haven of our affections and remain there, is a question that the next few weeks will decide one way or the other.'

We think it can now be said that the opera-going public in London at least have decided emphatically that they deeply appreciate the operas of both composers, and that they are grateful to Sir Joseph Beecham for enabling them to enjoy such a rich and enlightening experience. There is food for reflection in the fact that London has had to wait forty years for these revelations of Russian genius.

The most distinguished artist of the company without question is M. Chaliapine. He has a majestic presence and an exceptionally fine bass voice, which he employs with great technical skill, and always as a vent for sincere interpretation. He is withal a great actor.

As Moussorgsky's technical skill was not on a parity with his natural gifts, both of his operas have been edited and revised by his friend Rimsky-Korsakov. This matter is commented upon in Mrs. Newmarch's article, and need not be again discussed in this notice. No ordinary listener could possibly disentangle the work of one composer from the other, and therefore apart from any other question we have simply to judge what is presented as an artistic whole. 'Boris Godounov' was produced at the opening night of the season on June 24, and at once made a deep impression. It was splendidly mounted, the colour-scheme being often dazzlingly vivid, and it was wonderfully well performed. The originality of the music combined with its comparative simplicity and directness of expression made an instant appeal. This can be said, although there were dull moments that arose mainly from the fact that the action is conducted chiefly by men, whose voices, however well used, become at times monotonous. This predominance of male character is a necessity of the drama, but it is not the less a disadvantage from the musical standpoint. A great feature of the presentation was the singing and acting of the chorus. Rarely, if ever before, has such chorus-singing been heard at an English opera house. One never felt that misery which is only too often experienced at opera performances when the chorus is in conflict with the orchestra. Moreover the Russian chorists sang not merely in tune and with fine tone, to which their splendid basses contributed much richness, but with moving expression and singularly natural action. The agonising remorse culminating in the madness and death of the guilty Boris is depicted in profoundly stirring music that leads from one absorbing climax to another of increasing intensity. All this was brought out with terrible fidelity by M. Chaliapine. But there were others of the cast, Mlle. Petrenko, Mlle. Brian, M. Damaev, who deserve more mention than can be given here, and the great ability of the conductor, M. Emile Cooper, was a conspicuous feature.

'Khovanstchina' was performed for the first time on July 1. Although this sad play is thought by some admirers of the composer not to have inspired him to such heights as he attained in 'Boris,' we can only say that for our part we prefer this opera. The development of the story is full of variety, and Moussorgsky repeatedly shows his power to secure a thrill of emotional expression, sometimes by surprisingly simple means. His use of folk-song and folk-song idiom has great charm, and besides there is the contrast of the odour of sanctity in the use of ecclesiastical music always appropriately applied. The rhythmic appeal of the music is always strong, and sometimes fascinating. It is impossible to speak too highly of the mounting and performance of the work. Again M. Chaliapine was superb. M. Zaporozetz, Madame Petrenko, and Mlle. Brian were also great in their several parts, and others in the cast were fully adequate. The chorus-singing surpassed even that which was heard in 'Boris.' A hymn-like chorus at the end of the first Act kept the audience spellbound, and caused extraordinary enthusiasm. Never before has an operatic chorus been so fêted, and it was all richly deserved. The final catastrophe, in which the 'Old Believers' voluntarily place themselves on a funeral pyre and die, was deeply impressive. The music here has a certain reticence that is remarkable, but yet it seems to fit the situation. Once more we remark that of all the operas presented in this series we are most drawn to 'Khovanstchina.'

Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, 'Ivan the Terrible,' or 'La Pskovitianna,' which was first produced at St. Petersburg in 1873, was given for the first time here on July 8. The story can only be told briefly here. Ivan is a cruel ruler. His evil intentions regarding the inhabitants of Pskoff have been rumoured, and learning that he is about to visit the town the chief townsfolk are divided as to whether to resist or to submit to his wishes. A young rebel, Toucha, is in love with Olga, who is the reputed daughter of the local Prince but is really the illegitimate offspring of a former mistress of Ivan. The maid is deputed to make an offering to the dreaded tyrant, and as she is doing so Ivan is transfixed by the resemblance she bears to his former love and he afterwards ascertains that she is really his daughter. This revelation induces him to promise to spare the town the punishment he contemplated, and to forgive the maiden's lover. But the rebel is already advancing to attack Ivan, and she rushes out to stop his advance and is shot dead before her father. The display of his grief is the final scene of the opera. Although the music is always full of interest because of its strength and clarity it does not rise to supreme heights until the last Act. A procession scene has a splendour that dazzles, and there are numerous other incidents that call forth the skill and power of the composer. The music is always born of the dramatic demands, and does not stoop to make effects for their own sake. Again we have to note the all-round excellence of the performance, and to record the outstanding ability of M. Chaliapine. Mlle. Brian was a charming Olga; and the other principals were, to say the least, highly efficient. M. Emile Cooper, as before, distinguished himself as conductor. Altogether this was a memorable evening.

Other performances of these operas were given on later dates, 'Boris' being given specially before The King and Queen on July 21.

We can deal only very briefly with the ballet. The examples presented, that were already more or less familiar to London audiences, were 'Thamar,' 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' 'Scheherazade,' 'Narcisse,' 'Petrouchka,' 'Les Sylphides,' 'La Spectre de la Rose,' 'Prince Igor,' 'Pavillon d'Armide,' 'Carnaval,' 'L'Oiseau de Feu,' and 'Le Lac des Cygnes.' The following were new: 'Jeux,' a poem-dance, designed by M. Nijinsky and set to music by Debussy; 'La tragédie de Salomé,' founded on a poem by Humières, the choreography by M. Romanow and the music by Florent Schmitt; and 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' the design of which is by M. Nijinsky and the music by M. Stravinsky. Not one of these novelties can be claimed as a success. So far as the designs of the ballets are concerned, the authors seem to be striving to find new idioms of self-expression, a new æsthetic, the language of which they know themselves only imperfectly and which upsets preconceived ideas established so attractively by the very same artists. The drift to the cult of the angular exhibited in the ballet grafted on 'L'Après-midi'—the music of which seems to yearn for serpentine arabesques—is in 'Le Sacre du Printemps' freely developed, and the appeal seems to have little or no regard for lines of beauty, but only a vague connection with some theory of expression, an explanation of which was made on the stage by Mr. Edward Evans before the curtain rose.

The music baffles verbal description. To say that much of it is hideous as sound is a mild description. There is certainly an impelling rhythm traceable. Practically it has no relation to music at all as most of us understand the word.

The season closed on July 25, when the Russian Ballet was performed in London for the hundredth time. It may confidently be hoped that the success of the scheme will encourage Sir Joseph Beecham still further to increase the public indebtedness to him. A word of acknowledgment is due to Mr. Donald Baylis, the general manager, and to M. Serge de Diaghilew, who organized the company.

THE COLERIDGE-TAYLOR MEMORIAL

In the peaceful and picturesque cemetery at Bandon Hill the remains of Samuel Coleridge-Taylor lie resting. At the head of the grave a monument was recently erected, the headstone of which is of Carrara marble, 6 feet in height and 3 feet in width. On the face of the stone is portrayed the draped figure of an angel with outstretched wings. Beneath the figure is a realistic representation of clouds, and above is a wreath of laurel. The inscription, by Mr. Alfred Noyes, the poet, is as follows:

'In memory of Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, who died on September 1, 1912, at the age of thirty-seven, bequeathing to the world a heritage of an undying beauty. His music lives. It was his own, and drawn from vital fountains. It pulsed with his own life, and now it is his immortality. He lives while music lives. Too young to die: His great simplicity, his happy courage in an alien world, his gentleness, made all that knew him love him.

Sleep, crowned with fame, fearless of change or time,
Sleep, like remembered music in the soul,
Silent, immortal; while our discords climb
To that great chord which shall resolve the whole.
Silent, with Mozart, on that solemn shore;
Secure, where neither waves nor hearts can break;
Sleep, till the Master of the world once more
Touch the remembered strings and bid thee wake.

Then follows a stave with the four bars of music set to the words: 'Thus departed Hiawatha. Hiawatha the beloved'; and on the bevelled edge—'Erected by his wife and other lovers of the man and his music.'

This design was entrusted to Messrs. Charles E. Ebbutt, the well-known monumental sculptors of Queen's Road, Croydon, who have secured a highly creditable success.

We are glad to note that Mrs. Coleridge-Taylor has been granted a pension of £100 a year from the Civil List. This is a just recognition of her husband's genius in services to his country.

THE ASSOCIATED BOARD.

The twenty-fourth annual meeting of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music for Local Examinations in Music, was held at the Royal Academy of Music on July 10, Sir William E. Bigge presiding, and among those present being Sir A. C. Mackenzie (Principal of the Royal Academy of Music) and Sir Walter Parratt. The annual report stated that in 1912-13, in the United Kingdom, the number of candidates entered for the local centre examinations was 5,552, as against 5,381 in 1911-12. There were 1,222 passes in the advanced grade, and 1,426 in the intermediate grade, as against 1,196 and 1,511 in 1911-12. The number of candidates in the school examinations in the United Kingdom was 23,196, as against 21,135 in 1911-12. The Exhibitions offered by the Board in the United Kingdom were gained by Dorothy M. Davies, Cardiff Centre, harp; Elizabeth Gluckstein, London Centre, pianoforte; Hyman Grunbaum, Brighton Centre, violin; Leonard S. Jefferies, Bristol Centre, pianoforte; Hubert A. Marno, Croydon Centre, violin; and Elsie Watson, Huddersfield Centre, singing. The Exhibitions offered by the Board in the Dominions Overseas, in connection with the examinations of 1912, had been awarded to Lena Chisholm, Parramatta, New South Wales, violin; Kathleen M. Bradshaw, Melbourne, Victoria, pianoforte; Kathleen Levi, Dunedin, New Zealand, pianoforte; Freda Sweet, Calgary, Alberta, Canada, pianoforte; and Amy M. Wettinger, Malta, pianoforte.

MR. HEALEY WILLAN.

A CANADIAN APPOINTMENT.

Mr. Healey Willan has been appointed to the post of Head of the Theory School at the Conservatory of Music, Toronto, formerly held by Dr. Humphrey Anger, who has relinquished the post owing to ill-health.

Mr. Willan was born in London in 1880, and he entered the choir school of St. Saviour's, Eastbourne, in 1889. He studied pianoforte and harmony under the late Dr. W. H. Sangster, and played services in church when he was eleven years old.

After studying under Dr. W. S. Hoyte he passed the A.R.C.O. examination in 1896, and in that year became organist and choirmaster of St. Saviour's, St. Albans. He passed the F.R.C.O. in 1899, and was appointed organist to Christ Church, Wansstead, in 1900, and he formed a choral Society in that district. In 1903 he transferred his services to St. John the Baptist, Kensington, and this post he retained until his Canadian appointment necessitated his retirement. His compositions include: Organ—Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Prelude and Fugue in B minor, Epilogue; Services—Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat and E flat, Communion Services in C and E flat; Anthems—'There were shepherds,' 'While all things were in quiet silence.' Also several part-songs, and a considerable amount of chamber and orchestral music.

On July 22, some of Mr. Willan's friends assembled at Pinoli's restaurant to bid him farewell and to wish him success in his new sphere of labour. All who know Mr. Willan are aware of his skill as an organist, and his attainments generally as a musician. We congratulate Toronto on their acquisition, and we have much pleasure in commending Mr. Willan to the members of the profession in that city.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The distribution of the term's prizes by the Duke of Connaught was the central feature of a remarkably successful function held at the Academy, in the new Hall, on July 18. Among a great number of prize-winners the most conspicuous was Miss Ethel Edith Bilsland, who won the Dove prize for general excellence, assiduity and industry, and was specially complimented by Sir Alexander Mackenzie. The Principal in his address announced that among the gratifying results of the removal of the Academy into its new building was that the roll of pupils exceeded all previous records. The esprit-de-corps prevailing among old pupils was shown by their contributing £500 towards the decoration of the Hall. A vote of thanks to the Duke of Connaught was moved by Alderman Cooper (who announced that the new Hall was in future to be known as 'The Duke's Hall') and seconded by Sir William Bigge. The Duke of Connaught, in his reply, dwelt on the modern improvement in the state and life of music in England, and attributed a large share of the responsibility for this advance to the Royal Academy and the Royal College of Music. He exhorted students never to give up practising.

The prize-giving was preceded by a short concert in which three junior students of the Academy, Master Harry Alexander (trumpet), Master Egerton Tidmarsh and Miss Evangeline Livens (pianoforte) took a brilliant part.

THE SOCIETY OF WOMEN MUSICIANS.

Modernism in music was discussed with some thoroughness at the second Composers' Conference of the Society of Women Musicians, which took place at the Women's Institute, 92, Victoria Street, on July 4 and 5. In her opening address the president, Dr. Emily Daymond, compared present progressive changes in music with those of the past. Mr. Rutland Boughton spoke on the Phantasy Form, for which he thought 'Fancy Form' would prove a more stimulating name. He deprecated the tendency of composers to write, as Phantasies, works that were really 'tabloid sonatas'; a mutilated sonata, he said, was not a new art-form, as Phantasies claimed to be, and only the needs of a new life could create a new form. He believed in the combination of drama and chamber music as a field for future work. Mr. W. W. Cobbett discussed Mr. Boughton's paper in relation to the Phantasies that had come under his notice in connection with the Musicians' Company's competitions.

At the second meeting, Dr. Walford Davies dealt with the whole-tone idiom, which, he said, was based on a chord rather than on a scale. To use the whole-tone series for melody was to banish all the individuality and variety that ordinary melodic outline drew from the disposition of whole-tones and semitones. As a harmonic weapon the whole-tone chord brought new resources to the composer. Being uniform in its intervals it could be used, as Bach used the diminished seventh, as a 'harmonic exchange' for modulation. Mr. Thomas Dunhill spoke on modern harmony, and an excellent discussion ensued.

THE PATRON'S FUND CONCERT.

The six new works by British composers that were played by the London Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Patron's Fund, at Queen's Hall on July 15, gave food for mixed satisfaction. On the credit side was a common zeal for the modern spirit of suggestiveness, with its freedom of thought and handling; on the debit side was much lameness of expression. The workmanship had ease and confidence, but the invention was not strong, and little of the music had life of its own. The object of the Fund is not to put before the public the mature work of practised artists as much as to assist the immature and unpractised to discover their own weaknesses. What British composers of the rising generation most need to further their progress is more self-criticism, and nothing promotes this better than performance of their music. The concert will have done good service if it leads one or more of the composers represented to keep a closer watch on his thoughts. It is the fluent pen that wants the most careful guiding.

Some of the strongest music of the evening was found in the opening number, Dr. Cyril Rootham's tone-poem 'Pan,' which on the whole sustained a higher level of thought and effectiveness than any other work in the programme. The music that suggested the wild, panther-like element in the god's nature was cleverly done, and there was much well-directed individuality in the score. The work, however, was a little over-long, and its grip often slackened. It contained the making of an excellent tone-poem. Mr. Arthur Hinton's dramatic Romance for orchestra, 'Porphyria's Lover' (after Browning), was largely a series of disappointments; it was always about to do great things, both with its storm-motive and with its love-motive, but got no further than well-wounded promises. Mr. Ralph Letts, whose setting of Frederick Locker's 'Love, time, and death' was sung by Mr. Jamieson Dodds, needs radically to revise his ideas of the manner in which music should be employed to intensify or clarify the emotions of a vocalised text. His setting added nothing to the poem, as his vocal and instrumental parts were mutual hindrances rather than mutual aids to expression. A surer touch was revealed by Mr. A. von Ahn Carse, in his Variations on a theme in A minor. In his eight movements there was nothing forced, inappropriate, or ineffectual. The manner was refined, and many ideas felicitous. At the same time the work left the impression of timidity, and more of it than was necessary was rooted in the Victorian past. Incidentally, it is dangerous, since Elgar wrote his 'Enigma' Variations, to dwell with much fondness upon rising and falling sevenths. The most commanding work in the evening's list was Mr. Hubert Bath's Symphonic-poem,

'The visions of Hannele,' after Gerhart Hauptmann. It pictures the fleeting death-bed visions of a fever-stricken child who has been driven by despair to attempt suicide. It opens with a plaintive section that well suggests the drab pathos of the child's dying. The portrayal of the brutal father, and later, that of the Angel of Death and the hunch-backed village tailor are theatrical, and the theme of the gentle mother is undistinguished. The work lacks unity and consistent atmosphere. It 'wears its heart on its sleeve'; it states boldly where it should hint. Towards the end there are passages that grew from no more vital source than the composer's fluency and ease of craftsmanship. The scoring, however, is masterly, and there is considerable eloquence at certain moments. After this tale of woe some hope was roused by the motto affixed to Mr. John Greenwood's Orchestral fantasy—'God's in His Heaven, all's right with the world'—till it was discovered that the composer sets out to 'represent the struggle in the mind, where the various phases of thought and philosophy, together with the sorrows of life, threaten to destroy belief in the truth of Browning's words.' The work is built upon themes with high-sounding labels, such as 'Faith,' 'Brotherhood,' 'Sorrow,' 'The Fact,' but does not come within measurable distance of typifying them. It has little invention, but there are vigorous texture, vitality of manner, rather than of method, and much volubility. The remaining number in the programme was Gernsheim's E minor Violoncello concerto, which was skilfully and expressively played by Mr. Cedric Sharpe, Sir Charles Stanford conducting. The new works were conducted by their respective composers.

SLAVONIC MUSIC.

There has been no dearth of Slavonic music in London during the present century. For a time we were deluged with it. But it was from a few of the most prominent composers that the surfeit came, and most of the men of second rank remained little more than names to us. More recently enthusiasts such as M. Kuszewitzky have given us a better insight into their quality. Mr. Emil Mlynarski, conductor of the Scottish Orchestra at Glasgow, has now strengthened our appreciation of the Russian music of to-day by three orchestral concerts. These took place at Queen's Hall on June 19, 25, and 27, with the assistance of the London Symphony Orchestra. The chief work in the first programme, which for the rest was made up of Polish music, was M. Mlynarski's own Symphony in F, a musicianly and attractive work that made a good impression when introduced to London last year. The deepest appeal was made, however, by a symphonic-poem, 'Anhelli,' an imaginative work of telling musical and suggestive quality. Its 'programme' is 'the life and thoughts of a Polish exile in Siberia.' Karłowicz's Violin concerto, which was played by M. Paul Kochanski, can best be described as a pleasant work. The remaining work in the programme was an overture, 'Marya,' by Statkovski.

The concert on June 25 illustrated the work of Russian composers. It opened with Rimsky-Korsakoff's vigorous overture to 'Ivan the Terrible,' and contained Kallinikov's well-known Symphony in G minor, which has not lacked appreciation in this country. Two pieces by M. Wischnegradski—an 'Elegy' and a symphonic-poem, 'The nun'—displayed considerable power of thought and orchestral treatment. Liadov was represented by his 'Baba Yaga,' which was encoresd, and 'The enchanted lake,' a work of no great moment. Tchaikovsky's 'Sérénade mélancolique' for violin and orchestra, and Glazounow's 'Carneval' Overture completed the programme. The third programme was less interesting, as the only novelty, M. Vitezslav Novak's Symphonic-poem, 'In der Tatra,' contained much that was unsatisfactory. Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, Dvorák's Violin concerto, and Smetana's Overture to 'The bartered bride' made up the rest. At each concert M. Paul Kochanski proved himself an able, musicianly, and reliable violinist.

The residual impression of the music of the less-known Slavonic composers was that it had freshness rather than distinction in its ideas; that its freedom and effectiveness of orchestral treatment were so constant as to suggest a national trait; that its sentimentality was usually instinctive and unconscious, and its strength usually manufactured; and that a better series of programmes could be chosen from the music of our own composers without resort to the bigger men.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert of the season, which took place at Queen's Hall on June 23, served to introduce some of the latest works of Dr. Ethel Smyth. These were settings, under the collective title of 'Three moods of the sea,' of lyrics by Arthur Symonds, headed 'Requies,' 'Before the squall,' and 'After sunset,' and a marching song entitled 'On the road.' The telling, descriptive power with which Dr. Smyth portrayed the sea in 'The Wreckers' added a similar vividness to these sea-pictures. The composer thinks freely in orchestral terms of suggestive realism, and chooses her colouring and atmosphere with so sure a design that it is the tempestuousness or rest of the sea, and of nothing else, that she portrays. As in her other works, the significance of the music lies not so much in the merit of isolated ideas as in the strength of manner and treatment that underlies all the ideas, whatever their quality. The songs were excellently sung by Mr. Herbert Heyner. A wide gulf separated the styles shown by Dr. Smyth in her songs and M. Stojowski in his Pianoforte concerto, for the latter work contained scarcely a strong moment and little individuality, although one could observe the endeavour to achieve it. The composer played the solo part. The conductor of the concert was Herr Nikisch, whose powers were best revealed in Holbrooke's 'Les hommages' and Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony.

The Royal Choral Society brought its season to an end with a Coronation Concert at the Albert Hall on June 22. The work of the choir was confined to the singing of familiar numbers, including the 'Hallelujah Chorus,' under the direction of Mr. H. L. Balfour. The remainder of the programme was supplied by Miss Susanne Morvay (pianist), Mr. Guido Ciccolini, and Mr. Edmund Burke (vocalists).

VOCAL RECITALS.

Miss Alma Gluck displayed the perfection of her voice at Queen's Hall on the afternoon of June 24, and won the enthusiasm of a large audience. In the evening Miss Elena Gerhardt was heard with the delight that her singing always causes. Her programme was familiar, but as interpreted by two such artists as Miss Gerhardt and Herr Arthur Nikisch it was a series of new sensations. Miss Florence Macbeth increased her fame as a light coloratura singer by singing familiar operatic numbers at Queen's Hall on July 1, accompanied by an orchestra under Mr. Thomas Beecham.

Madame Nina Jaques-Dalroze, who gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on July 8, showed high accomplishment as a lieder singer. In its expressiveness, refinement, and beauty of voice her singing gave exceptional pleasure. M. Jaques-Dalroze accompanied with great ability.

Three recitals by Madame Yvette Guilbert have to be recorded. They took place at Bechstein Hall on June 27, July 1 and 4, attracted crowded audiences, and gave unlimited delight.

Vocal recitals have been given by Miss Dora Delise (Bechstein Hall, June 23); Miss Florence Shee (Steinway Hall, June 24); Miss Gladys Moger in a programme of British music (Æolian Hall, June 27); Miss Emilia Conti (Bechstein Hall, June 30); Mr. Geoffrey Comyn (Æolian Hall, June 30); Mr. Charles Copeland (Trinity College of Music, July 2); Miss Betty Callish (Bechstein Hall, July 3); Miss Emma Davidson (Broadwood Rooms, July 9); Madame Emily Thornfield (Steinway Hall, July 10); Mrs. Henry Bligh Forde (Æolian Hall, July 11); Miss Margaret Huston (Bechstein Hall, July 11); Mr. Eric Marks (Bechstein Hall, July 17); Madame Ernestine Enriquez (Broadwood Rooms, July 18).

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Mr. Carl Friedberg chose a classical programme for his recital at Æolian Hall on June 22, and carried it out with considerable distinction. His playing had dignity, massive-ness, and finish, and he showed a sense of beauty in interpretation. He was heard again on June 28. At the same hall, on the following day, Miss Aline von Barentzen, a pianist of less than twenty summers, made her first appearance in London, and displayed technical powers that were quite exceptional. The long-sustained high-pressure difficulty of Brahms's Variations on a theme by Paganini seemed to cause her no anxiety, and she played the tremendous work clearly, fluently, with unhesitating rhythm and an air of enthusiastic enjoyment.

Mr. Mark Hambourg played with miraculous technical brilliance in some Bach transcriptions at Queen's Hall on June 28.

Pianoforte recitals have been given by Miss Marion Keighley Snowden (Æolian Hall, June 23); Mr. Nino Rossi (Steinway Hall, June 24); Miss Hilda Saxe (Bechstein Hall, June 25); Mr. Wladimir Cernikoff (Æolian Hall, June 26); Miss Augusta Coen (Steinway Hall, June 27).

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

Two interesting recitals were given at Æolian Hall on June 11 and 21 by Madame Mary Boyer (vocalist) and Mr. Jan Ehrhard (pianist), both of whom are artists of culture and ability. At the second recital Madame Boyer's singing of Massenet's 'Werther' so pleased the audience that it was repeated. In company with Herr Johannes Wolff, Mr. Ehrhard took part in Mozart's Sonata in F for pianoforte and violin.

Master Duci Kerekjarto, a small Hungarian violinist who is not yet twelve years of age, astonished all who came to Bechstein Hall on June 22 with the ease and accuracy of his playing in such difficult music as Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' He gave a second recital at Steinway Hall on July 9, and appeared again at the London Opera House on July 15.

Mr. David and Madame Clara Mannes gave a second recital of Sonatas for violin and pianoforte at Bechstein Hall on June 24, choosing their programme for the occasion entirely from Beethoven. Their playing was distinguished by its refinement, unity, and technical skill. On July 3 they gave a third recital, and introduced a new Sonata by Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason.

Max Reger's Sonata in A minor for violoncello and pianoforte was played at Bechstein Hall on June 24 by Mr. Cedric Sharpe and his father, Mr. Herbert Sharpe. Its performance served to show that Mr. Cedric Sharpe is progressing creditably, and will soon join the front rank of English violoncellists.

Mr. Sigismund Stojowski gave a recital of his compositions at Æolian Hall, on June 25, with the help of Mr. Paul Kochanski (violinist) and Miss Elizabeth Munthe-Kaas (vocalist). The programme helped to confirm his reputation as a clever composer of miniatures.

Mr. Reginald Wrennath (baritone), Mr. Gutia Casini (violinist), Mr. Ernesto Bernmen and Mr. Frank La Forge (pianists), gave a joint recital at Bechstein Hall on June 25. All are young, come from America, and possess the capacity of interesting an audience.

Many artists assisted in a concert given by the Irish Folk-song Society at Broadwood Rooms, on June 25. The feature of the programme was the modern treatment of folk-tunes as exemplified in the works of Mr. Hubert Bath (a Pianoforte trio), Mr. Cyril Scott, and others.

Miss Daisy Kennedy (violinist) and Mr. Vernon Warner (pianist), played attractively in Sonatas of Brahms (D minor) and César Franck at Æolian Hall, on June 25. On July 10, the same artists were associated in Grieg's C minor Sonata; Miss Kennedy gave Mr. Cyril Scott's 'Tallahassee' Suite, accompanied by the composer; and Mr. Warner gave solos, including Franck's 'Prelude, Choral, and Fugue.'

Herr Georg Wille, the court violoncellist to the King of Saxony, who made a deep impression on the occasion of his recent first visit to London, gave a second recital at Bechstein Hall on June 26. His magnificent interpretations of Brahms's Sonata, Op. 99 (with Mr. Richard Epstein) and Bach's sixth unaccompanied Suite were of exceptional quality.

Mr. and Mrs. York Bowen (pianist and vocalist) gave one of their interesting recitals at Æolian Hall on June 26. It was announced that the programme of their next recital would be devised to illustrate the suitability of the viola and horn for obbligati, and that both instruments would be played by Mr. Bowen.

Messrs. A. Verhey (pianist), J. Röntgen, junr. (violinist), and J. Mossel (violinellist), who form the 'Rotterdam' Trio, were heard at Bechstein Hall on June 27, and played works by Beethoven (Op. 97), Tchaikovsky (A minor), and Prof. Röntgen, senr., in a highly attractive manner.

The Rawdon Briggs Quartet, who are better known in the North than in London, gave a concert in conjunction with Mr. Carl Renol (pianist) at Bechstein Hall on July 7. Their high ability was displayed in Quartets by Haydn (D major) and Brahms (E flat major).

M. Hollman, the famous French violinellist, showed at Bechstein Hall on July 10 how firm a hold he retains on his powers.

Recitals have also been given by Miss Dorothy de Vin, violinist (Bechstein Hall, June 26); Mr. Paul Ludwig, violinellist (Broadwood Rooms, June 26); and Signor Mario Lorenzi, harpist (Steinway Hall, July 9).

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

An excellent students' chamber concert was given at this institution on July 10. The chief work of the evening was Schumann's String Quartet in A major; but greater interest was roused by the performance of a work for three flutes, by Kuhlau, which was played with distinguished artistic effect, and by Mr. Nicholas Gatty's attractive Violin sonata, as played by Miss Dudding (violinist) and Miss Stokes (pianist). Misses Hanes, Craven and Rees were the vocalists of the occasion, and Master John Nicholas played Schumann's 'Abeeg' Variations for pianoforte.

The term concluded with an orchestral concert that derived considerable importance from the performance of Dr. Arthur Somervell's 'Thalassa' Symphony, recently produced by the London Symphony Orchestra, and from the production of a new Pianoforte concerto in E minor by Mr. J. Alan Taffs, the Mendelssohn scholar, who interpreted the solo part. The work is distinguished by its maturity of manner, resourcefulness, and vigorous invention. Vocal numbers were given by Miss Clytie Hine and Miss Olive Sturgess, and Sir Charles Stanford conducted.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

A concert given at the School on July 2 revealed the existence of much well-directed talent, as represented in the work of a number of instrumentalists and vocalists. The chief concert of the term took place at Queen's Hall on July 17, when the students' orchestra played under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald, the Principal, and the choir sang under the direction of Mr. Smallwood Metcalfe. The scope and thoroughness of the study of orchestral music carried on at the School were exemplified in admirable performances of the 'Meistersinger' Overture, the first movement of the 'Eroica' Symphony, the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Scherzo, and the accompaniment to Max Bruch's 'Scottish Fantasia' for violin. Both Miss Rebe Kussmann, who was the soloist in this work, and Miss Nellie Walker, who sang two of Elgar's 'Sea-Pictures', possess exceptional ability for students.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The orchestral concert given by this institution at Queen's Hall on July 16, as usual gave a comprehensive view of the work of the best students and proved it to be of a high standard. The soloists who appeared were Miss Aileen Butler (violinist), Master Richard Johnson (pianist), Miss Dorothy Meallin (violinist), and Miss Mabel Apperly (violinellist), each of whom played a concerto movement; Miss Alice Booth, Miss Eva Pocock, Miss Agnes Browning, Mr. Stanley Wright, and Mr. Rodolphe Gaillard (vocalists), and Mr. A. E. Bolton (organist). The orchestra, under Mr. Wilhelm Sachse's direction, gave an excellent account of Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture.

The artists who appeared at Æolian Hall on June 20 under the auspices of the Professional Musicians' Début Society were Mr. Robert Baladi and Miss Hildegarde Nash (violinists), Miss Augusta Coen (pianist), Miss Muriel Michell, Mr. Lewis Stanton, and Mr. Frank Foster (vocalists).

The usual concert in aid of the Italian Hospital and other Italian charities in London, took place at Queen's Hall on June 30, when Signor Caruso was the chief attraction. About one thousand pounds were collected for the charities.

The efficiency of up-to-date methods of teaching has been shown by concerts given by the pianoforte pupils of Mr. Gerald Allen (Æolian Hall, June 20); Mr. Carl Weber (Bechstein Hall, July 8) and Mr. Tobias Matthay (Bechstein Hall, July 10 and 17), and the vocal pupils of Mr. Sterling Mackinlay (Steinway Hall, July 10).

BOURNEMOUTH.

Events of importance have been few and far between during the past month, mainly because Mr. Dan Godfrey and the orchestral members have been indulging in a well-merited holiday. For a bare four weeks out of the fifty-two serious music is in a more or less dormant condition, and even those persons who are only indirectly associated with the Winter Gardens undertaking welcome the brief respite from Bournemouth's tearing propaganda on behalf of whatsoever is best in music.

Three concerts of considerable interest have, however, given early summer visitors some idea as to the nature of the music that the town provides. The appearance of the Finnish Choir, 'Suomen Laulu,' was a noteworthy occasion, and Bournemouth may be accounted fortunate in being selected as the locale of a concert by a choir of such an established reputation, seeing that this town and Eastbourne were the only provincial centres visited by this organization. The next attraction was a recital by M. Pachmann, on June 20, the eminent pianist's performances and platform byplay resulting in the usual uproarious enthusiasm. If the statement that M. Pachmann is about to enter upon his farewell engagements is a true one, then shall we have cause to lament the departure from public view of one of the most captivating personalities of our time. Then again, on June 27, Miss Maggie Teyte made her first appearance here. Unfortunately, this rising singer was suffering from throat trouble, and so was unable to do herself complete justice.

The Symphony Concerts continued, up to the time of the instrumentalists' annual vacation, their pleasant and unassuming course. A good leavening of standard works did much to ensure the approbation of holiday-makers, who rightly or wrongly are always supposed to be the most conservative of persons in their choice of music. Anyway, compositions of the stamp of the E flat Symphony of Mozart invariably meet with general acceptance, and it is certainly not a depraved taste that finds sweet contentment in the beautiful works of Mozart, or music of a similar perfection. The soloists have comprised Mr. Algernon Holland, one of the first violins, and probably the best artist in that department of the orchestra; Mr. Walter Leah, the recently-appointed first clarinet; Miss Jacoba Wolters, harpist in the Municipal Orchestra, and Miss Monica Rutland, who delighted the audience in a not very appropriate transcription for two harps of Schubert's 'Ave Maria.' Further contrast was provided by the excellent vocal performances of Mr. Manitto Klitgaard and Mr. John Booth. It is only necessary to add that the concert on July 3 was conducted by Mr. F. King-Hall, the leader of the orchestra, in the absence of Mr. Godfrey.

A forthcoming event which promises some original features is the preparatory work for the open-air choral drama which Mr. Rutland Boughton is hoping to produce next year. The preliminary instruction in the choral and dancing branches will be imparted at a 'musical holiday' camp at Bournemouth during the month of August. The actual production of the drama will take place, circumstances permitting, at Glastonbury.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The two Festivals of the Three Towns Choral Union were numerically more successful than any that have taken place for several years, and as the revival has been gradual during the last few seasons it may be anticipated that a bright future is before this very useful organization. The first service took place in Emmanuel Church, Plymouth, on June 17, and the second in St. George's Church, Stonehouse, on June 26. Thirteen choirs participated—St. Augustine, St. Gabriel, St. Catharine, Emmanuel (Plymouth), St. George and St. Matthew (Stonehouse), St. Mark, St. Paul, Stoke Damerel, St. Barnabas, St. Bartholomew, St. Michael, and Garrison Church (Devonport). The service book was that published by the Diocesan Association, the canticles being sung to Hopkins in D. The anthem was Wesley's 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel,' and the festal Te Deum was Walmisley in C. The singing of the 350 choristers evidenced artistic and conscientious preparation on the part of Mr. Manley Martin, the conductor, to whose musicianly and capable judgment was due the high standard of reverence and accuracy which characterized the whole service. Special periods of impressiveness were the subdued performance of the liturgy and the intelligent and careful singing of the Psalms. The organist on the former occasion was Mr. R. Waddy, and on the second Miss D. Clark.

For some months past a special committee appointed by the Plymouth Borough Council has considered the problem of the Guildhall Choir, which has achieved great work for many years under the direction of Mr. H. Moreton, borough organist. Opinion has been expressed by the public that with the facilities granted by the Corporation, the Guildhall Choir has had undue advantages over other Societies of like character, and in view of this, it has been moved that it is undesirable that the Corporation should permit the maintenance of the Guildhall Choir and Orchestra as municipal or privileged or subsidised organizations. It was therefore suggested that the profit-sharing principle be eliminated from the scheme of Corporation concerts, and that the duties of the borough organist be confined to organ recitals and the use of the organ on specified public occasions, with permission to supplement the recitals with local talent or replace them by concerts under the auspices of local musical Societies. The aim of the committee may be to assist local music, but how far this arrangement will tend to limit the standard of local knowledge and ideas remains yet to be seen. If other Societies spring up to take advantage of the withdrawal of the severe competition which has been experienced from the Guildhall Choir, one desirable object will have been achieved.

A propos, it is pleasing to state that a choir for unaccompanied singing will probably make its appearance in the autumn. Hitherto Mr. A. C. Faulk's Sherwell Choir has been the only mixed-voice combination of that class, and it has necessarily been somewhat restricted in its plans by financial risk.

Other preparations are in process for next season. A visit will be paid to Plymouth by Madame Tetrassini, through the agency of Messrs. Moon & Sons, and the Misses Smith have announced interesting engagements for their third series of Musical Matinées.

DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

An organ recital was given in Lynton Parish Church on June 26, by Miss H. A. Scriven, assisted by Mrs. Edwards and Mr. Telford, vocalists.

Twenty-five choirs, affiliated in the North Devon Choral Union, produced a total of 640 singers at the annual Festival at Ilfracombe on July 2, when Mr. T. Roylands-Smith, conductor, obtained excellent results from preparatory training given to the individual choirs. The diocesan book was used, and Mr. A. W. S. Salter, parish organist, presided at the organ. All arrangements were made by the Rev. E. J. Jeffery, hon. secretary, and the service was characterized by devotional impressiveness. The tempi erred, if at all, on the side of deliberation, but there was no sense of dragging or slackness. The singing of the Benedictus to a singularly beautiful and appropriate chant in D, by Dr. C. W. Pearce, was greatly effective, and the interpretation of the anthem, 'How dear are Thy counsels' (Crotch) was also a source of religious influence. Messrs. Sydney Harper (father and son), of Barnstaple, were the sub-conductors.

Music in the Pavilion at Torquay continues on its high level and attracts continually large audiences. The violinist, Melsa, played two Concertos (Bach in E and Paganini in D) and other pieces with the Municipal Band on July 5, Mr. Basil Hindenberg conducting. Miss Ruth Vincent, Mr. Ivor Foster, Miss Violet Elliott, and Mr. Frank Webster have made appearances recently; and on July 21 the orchestra gave a Tchaikovsky concert.

There is no more self-sacrificing and artistic conductor of a choral Society to be found than Mr. Harold O. Jones, who labours assiduously and with the highest purpose against special difficulties in the little moorland town of Ashburton. He is now preparing his members for Festival performances in the Parish Church in October, of the 'Hymn of Praise' and 'The Creation'; and during the hot summer weeks practices are being held with much enthusiasm.

'The Yeomen of the Guard' was performed on June 18 by the Western Amateur Operatic Society at Totnes under the direction of Mr. Pendarves Trist. The chorus sang remarkably well, and the principals were excellently chosen. Exeter Amateur Operatic Society, at their annual meeting voted the sum of £40 to be paid to charitable institutions as a result of the performances last season of 'Utopia Limited' and 'The Mikado,' making a total of £750 thus contributed during the last seven years. 'Dorothy' was selected for performance next season, Mr. Allan Allen and Mr. Richard Weathersby being re-elected musical director and stage manager respectively.

CORNWALL.

Troon United Methodist Choir sang anthems and choruses at St. Stithian's on June 26, under the direction of Mr. Varker. The choir connected with Penzance Y.M.C.A. gave an open air concert at Camborne on July 4, Mr. Tregarthen conducting.

Choirs from the Deaneries of Carnmarth, Kerrier, and Penwith accepted invitations to join the Truro Cathedral Choir at the Annual Festival of the Diocesan Choral Association on July 7. The choristers numbered 524, of whom 310 were in the processional division. The conductor was Dr. Monk, organist of the Cathedral, and the organist for the occasion was Mr. Gilbert. The diocesan service book offered no special difficulties to the average parish choir, but it comprised music well adapted to raise the standard of singing and selection. The canticles were sung to a setting by Dr. H. Brewer, and the anthem was Blair's 'King of glory, King of peace.' The performance of the music showed an improvement on that of previous years, and in his sermon the Bishop of the Diocese commended the aims and achievements of the Association.

The same book was used by the choirs of the Deanery of Powder, at their annual Festival at Kea, on July 15, when 210 singers participated. Dr. Monk again conducted, with Mr. A. W. Gill at the organ. The singing was hearty and intelligent, the choirs represented being Perranzabuloe, Feock, Creed, Chacewater, Kea, Truro (St. John's), Ladoek, St. Michael Penkevil, Kenwyn, and Truro Cathedral.

Eight choirs from North Cornwall amalgamated in a Festival service at St. Teath, on July 9, these being St. Teath, Lanteglos, Davidstow, Tintagel, Forrabury, Minster, Otterham, and Delabole. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Burnett in A, and the anthem was 'He shall dwell in the land' (Stainer). The Rev. Byron Scott conducted, and Miss Childs Clarke presided at the organ.

The South-western section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians met at Paignton on July 19, for quarterly business, under the chairmanship of Mr. F. L. Harris, supported by Mr. Reginald B. Moore, hon. secretary, and Mr. T. Roylands-Smith, hon. treasurer.

LIVERPOOL.

It is certain that among the great centres Liverpool more than held its own in the tumultuous welcome given by the citizens to their Majesties The King and Queen during their recent tour in Lancashire.

It would appear that in no other place has music worthy of the name played such a definitely ordered part. In St. George's Hall, where their Majesties were received by the civic authorities, there was fine singing by a hundred voices from the Philharmonic Society's chorus, conducted by Mr. H. A. Branscombe, and accompanied on the great organ by the city organist, Mr. H. F. Ellingford, who also gave a recital of suitable music prior to the ceremony. The choral music included the National Anthem and Gounod's stately march and chorus from 'La Reine de Saba,' 'Hail to thee, King.'

It was the singing of the massed choirs of the Church Choir Association at the subsequent opening of the Gladstone Dock that most impressed their Majesties. This superb choir of 1,220 men and boys was formed from sixty-three church choirs that had previously taken part in the Festivals of the Association. The carefully prepared performance reflected credit on the musical organizations of the city, and especially upon Mr. F. H. Burstall, the Cathedral organist, who conducted, Mr. Ralph H. Baker, the originator and mainspring of the Association, and also upon the various choirmasters and officials, by whom it is well served.

The Band of H. M. Irish Guards provided the accompaniments to the two chief choral items—Elgar's 'Land of Hope and Glory' and Hugo Pierson's inspiring 'Ye mariners of England.' Conducted by their bandmaster, Mr. Charles Hassell, the fine band played a selection of music in which native art was represented by Edward German's 'Welsh Rhapsody' and by excerpts from Sullivan's operas.

The scene was one of great animation when the 'Galatea,' with their Majesties on board, slowly glided up the dock and broke the ribbons stretched across the river entrance. When the yacht was moored the National Anthem was played, and the choir sang Elgar's 'Land of Hope and Glory,' in which Mr. Burstall had happily directed the men's voices to be heard first, then the clear treble of the boys in the refrain, and finally the full choir in harmony in the chorus. Both verses were sung in this manner while the King and Queen remained standing on the upper deck of the yacht facing the singers at the opposite side of the dock, which is comparatively narrow. In the short service, which was conducted by the Lord Bishop of Liverpool, the huge choir was utilised in the choral responses and the Lord's Prayer, distinctly and sonorously chanted, and also in the hymn, 'Praise the Lord, ye heavens adore Him,' which was sung to Haydn's setting, 'Austria.' Lastly came Mr. Burstall's devotional three-fold 'Amen,' which was beautifully sung, unaccompanied, and a verse of Dr. Cummings's arrangement of the National Anthem. As their Majesties departed, 'Ye mariners of England' was a fitting and appropriate choice.

The aims and achievements of the Church Choir Association, which has done so much to improve church choirs and to raise the standard of church music in Liverpool, were never more usefully exhibited than on this historic occasion. The Association may well be encouraged to persevere in its good work.

On the following Sunday, July 13, their Majesties attended a parade of the local Territorials, and a drumhead service held in St. George's Hall. Led by singers stationed on the organ-gallery, the choral music was chiefly sustained by the uniformed assembly itself, and the thousands of Lancashire throats produced a thrilling and impressive volume of tone in the simple music of well-known hymns. The city organist, Mr. Ellingford, was among those who received the honour of presentation to their Majesties at the conclusion of the service.

Writing on the subject of H. H. Pierson's music in a letter inserted in a local contemporary, Mr. Theodore Hill draws attention to the fact that Pierson's oratorio 'Jerusalem,' the second part of 'Faust,' the Concert-Overtures of the dimensions of symphonies, not to mention over a hundred delightful songs, many with orchestral accompaniments, are still reposing on the shelf. Mr. Hill writes as one who knew Pierson intimately; his father, the late Mr. J. F. Hill, so long the chorus-master at the Norwich Festivals, prepared the performance of Pierson's 'Jerusalem' which was given at Norwich in 1852. Mr. Hill possesses the MS. of Pierson's setting of 'Not a drum was heard,' which he thinks would take any audience by storm; yet it remains unpublished. Whatever may be the reason for the strange and almost studied neglect of Pierson's music in this country, it is at least remarkable that 'Ye mariners of England' was not performed in its entirety at the Gladstone Dock ceremony; for, although the chorus-parts in the official music book issued by Messrs. Novello clearly indicated the silent bars for chorus, which were intended to be played by the band alone, they were omitted in the performance, and the orchestral prelude and symphonies between the verses were not played, although they are distinct features of the work. Whoever was responsible for this mutilated version showed little respect for a native composer who has claims to be better remembered.

During the summer season the concerts provided by the enterprising management of the New Brighton Tower have been well attended. A notably good performance of Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' was given on June 29 by the combined Liverpool Ladies' Choir and the male voices of the Liverpool Vocal Union, conducted by a lady, Madame Fanny de Boufflers, who exhibited ample command over her orchestral and choral forces. On Sunday evening, July 6, Mr. Rimmer, the Tower conductor, successfully directed a Wagner-Tchaikovsky orchestral concert. An approaching event is the competitive 'Eisteddfod,' to be held on September 13, when the adjudicators appointed are Dr. Roland Rogers and Mr. Harry Evans.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The Royal progress through Lancashire has loomed large in the public mind during the past month, but music has not played quite so prominent a part as it did in Staffordshire in April, or in the South Wales coalfield last year. At Crewe Hall two leading North Staffordshire choirs sang for the entertainment of the Royal guests, but Lord Derby 'put on' a music-hall show and a kinetophone; there was quite a good orchestra, and one is glad to know that the most purely musical 'turn' (Olga, Elgar, and Eli, the flautist trio) gave the rarest delight. This trio consists of Mr. Eli Hudson, his wife and sister. Of the singing propensities of the Lancastrians The King and Queen had plenty of roadside experiences. The necessarily hurried itinerary prevented such notable choirs as the Manchester Orpheus, the two Southport choirs, or the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal from giving of their best—open-air singing on a breezy day is perhaps rather a mixed delight—but two East Lancashire towns, Colne and Nelson, contrived a time-table which permitted the Colne Orpheus and Nelson Arion to welcome their Majesties in the true spirit of gleemen in 'Here's life and health to England's King,' the respective conductors coming in for warm recognition from the Royal visitors. Some of us fall asleep with the music of the day singing in our minds, and I often wondered whether the King and Queen experience anything like the same feelings towards the National Anthem that a musical critic does to the 'Messiah,' say at Christmastime, when he cannot escape from it. One may humbly suggest that when the next Royal tour is contrived, more ingenuity be displayed and the avoidance of the stereotyped National Anthem secured. 'Land of Hope and Glory' was not inaptly described once as perhaps the broadest open-air tune composed since Beethoven's 'Freude, schöner Götterfunken.' Moreover it is distinctly British—at once beefy and breezy; but only a few towns gave it an airing. In one place the school teachers contrived a brilliant and daring variant on the old song, 'Kind, kind and gentle is she,' making the second line to run 'Kind is Queen Mary.'

The most impressive feature has been the singing of tens of thousands of youngsters in some simple unison hymn tune or other melody. At Bolton there were twenty thousand of them, assembled in forty minutes on a huge market square, closed in on all sides by high buildings. The sensation of hearing this multitude of shrill trebles pouring forth 'All people that on earth do dwell' to the 'Old Hundredth,' with all its heavy charge of dear associations, was remarkable. A writer in the Manchester Guardian said: 'Verse after verse they sang, and as the voices rose and fell like one voice, virginal, almost unearthly, as the voices of children are, one almost wished that each verse might be the last, so near was it all coming to tears.' Where the youngsters were gathered in some more open space, as was often the case, these effects were dissipated.

The only music in Manchester at present is at the Royal Manchester College examinations. Here one more product of the Lancashire competitive Festivals—Frank Slater—bids fair to become a really first-class tenor singer. Mr. Harry Baynton Power, who in his youth also 'swept the boards' at these Festivals in the pianoforte classes, has developed more than a respectable talent for composition, to which frequent reference has been made here. Oscar Wilde's 'Dorian Gray' has furnished him with a poetical basis for a series of three violin pieces, 'Solitude,' 'Contemplation,' and 'Gaiety,' in which the writing seems to be more technical than emotional. Mr. Frank Tyrer, a pupil of R. J. Forbes, has followed up his recent part-song compositions with some very individual pianoforte pieces.

Sir Henry Wood has been down for a rehearsal with Mr. Brand Lane's choir for a forthcoming performance on 'festival' scale of 'Elijah.' Richter never professed any strong regard for this work, and Balling had either never conducted it or never heard it prior to last winter; so Manchester chorus-lovers will have a mild awakening ere long, for whether you go all the way with Sir Henry or not in his readings, he does galvanize even the most hackneyed works.

Apocryphal articles in these columns on seaside and inland spa orchestras, and the taste of visitors, the following information from Southport is not without interest. Last month a thousand voting cards were distributed amongst the patrons of the Southport Corporation Band (of the 'Military band' type) playing in the Municipal Gardens; five hundred were returned, suggesting two hundred pieces. The following found most favour: 'William Tell' Overture; Liszt's 'Rhapsodie No. 2'; 'Tannhäuser' Overture; Tchaikovsky's '1812'; 'The Pink Lady' (Ivan Caryll); 'Nights of gladness' Valse; Selection 'Gipsy love'; 'Hullo, Ragtime'; and 'The Rosary' as a cornet solo. Obviously there is room for much improvement in the tastes of Southport—there is need for the resuscitation both of the triennial Festival and the annual competitive one.

Dr. E. C. Bairstow's appointment to York Minster has necessitated some alteration of his Lancashire Choral Society arrangements; he is permitted to retain Preston but not Blackburn St. Cecilia, where Mr. Edgar C. Robinson, of Wigan, follows him as conductor.

At Dalton Hall, in aid of the funds of the Ancoats Settlement, on July 17 and 18, performances were given by a number of University amateurs of Milton's 'Comus,' with music by old Henry Lawes 'and others of the period'; Dr. Keighley arranged the items for female-voice choir. A 'Shepherds' dance' and a Sarabande were given by friends of Miss L. Ratcliffe, orchestral accompaniments being furnished by the members of the Withington Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Wilhelm Schroeder.

The first of Dr. R. R. Terry's series of Bach Concerts, announced in our last issue, took place on June 25 at Westminster Cathedral Hall. The choir was formed from that of the Cathedral, the orchestra was supplied by the Society of Women Musicians, and the soloists were chosen from the choir. Dr. Terry conducted. There was nothing pretentious in the choosing of the programme or the manner of its performance. Everything was done in the spirit that prompted Dr. Terry to give the concerts—that of making the music known. The cantata 'Uns ist ein Kind geboren,' for choir and soloists, was the chief work in the scheme; the smaller numbers included the Kyrie Eleison from the 'Short Mass' in G, the Concerto in D for flute (played by Miss Maude Penville), and solo arias. In all, five vocalists took part. The concert was thoroughly pleasing to those who look upon music as an intellectual enjoyment rather than as an entertainment. The second of the series is announced for October 28.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

EASTBOURNE.—'Elijah' was performed by the Eastbourne Choral and Orchestral Societies at Floral Hall, Devonshire Park, on July 2, under the direction of Mr. Francis J. Foote. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The interpretation was marked by spirit and great efficiency, and a large audience showed keen appreciation.

HARROGATE.—The Leeds New Choral Society paid a visit to Harrogate on June 25, and gave a performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' under the direction of Mr. Julian Clifford, whose orchestra took part. The choral-singing was of high efficiency, and excellent in tone and expressive quality; the orchestral playing was still more conspicuous for merit. The solo parts were taken by the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford, Mr. John Perry, and Mr. George Baker. The programme also included part-songs given under the direction of Mr. H. M. Turton. This was the first appearance of the Leeds New Choral Society at Harrogate. An enthusiastic welcome was extended to the singers by the audience, and great delight was shown at the quality of the performance.

HORSTADE.—Three performances of Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas' were given in the grounds of Horstead House, on July 16 and 17, by the Colthshall and Horstead Musical Society. The principal parts were taken by Miss Jessie Epps (Dido), Miss Diver (Sorceress), Miss Gladys Blume (Belinda), and Mr. Lewis Stroud (Æneas). The Rev. V. N. Gilbert conducted.

HULL.—The semi-jubilee of the Hull School of Music was celebrated on June 18, when the Sheriff of Hull, Mr. Hubert Johnson, presided, Mrs. Hubert Johnson presenting the prizes and certificates won by the students. During the year three students have gained professional diplomas, viz., Miss Alice Mason (L.R.A.M.), Miss Irene Sibley (A.T.C.L.), and Miss Doris Moxon (A.T.C.L.), and thirty-three have won public prizes, including a T.C.L. Exhibition of £9 gr. od., awarded to Miss Doris White. Congratulations were offered to the students upon their work, and to the founder and principal, Madame Alice Sharrah; the headmaster, Mr. J. T. Pye; and the staff generally. A students' concert followed the prize-giving, the programme including several important works.

JOHANNESBURG.—The Choral Society of eighty-five singers and the Orchestral Society of fifty players joined forces on July 9 in an excellent concert at Caledonian Hall. The combined bodies were heard in Beethoven's 'Creation's Hymn,' Gounod's 'Soldiers' Chorus,' and other works. Orchestral and other miscellaneous numbers made up the programme, which Mr. F. W. Peters conducted.

KINGSTON (JAMAICA).—The second annual concert of the Glee-Singers, held on May 27, sustained the promise of the first, which was reported in these columns in April, 1912. The list of madrigals and part-songs included Bateson's 'Sister, awake!', Bantock's 'My love is like a red, red rose' and 'On Himalay,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Drake's drum' (female voices) and 'Summer is gone,' and German's 'O peaceful night.' Orchestral and solo numbers were also given. Mr. George D. Goode, who conducted, secured some excellent results, and the audience—which included the Governor of Jamaica and the Archbishop of the West Indies—were much gratified.

LEEDS.—Mr. J. T. Standing has been appointed director of the Band of the 29th Canadian Light Horse, at Saskatoon. Until his departure he was bandmaster of the Leeds Army Service Corps Band.—The Cleckheaton Victoria Prize Band have given two concerts at Armley, the proceeds being in aid of the Workpeople's Hospital Fund.—Wortley Highfield School anniversary services comprised a children's musical performance, 'Danger signals and rocks that wreck.' Mr. and Mrs. Boardman are to be complimented on the effort.

MELBOURNE.—Great successes have been won by Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford in Australia. On May 17 they sang at the opening of Messrs. J. & N. Tait's new concert hall at Melbourne, a building that will seat 2,400 persons. The Governor-General (Lord Denman) was present.

OUNCLE.—The programme of the concert given at Oundle School on July 5 was, as usual, ambitious in design and well carried out. The opening movement of Beethoven's second Symphony was the chief orchestral number; the school choir took part in Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Viking song,' with orchestral accompaniment; and the junior singing-class was heard in folk-songs and other unison songs. Movements from Dvorák's B flat Pianoforte trio and Schumann's E flat Pianoforte quintet were played, and solos were given. The concert was an exhibition of exceptional musical culture in a school, and great credit is due to the music-master, Mr. C. M. Spurling, for his enthusiasm and capacity.

PERTH (W.A.).—Gounod's 'Mors et Vita' was performed on May 21 at the Roman Catholic Cathedral by a selected choir of 100 voices under the direction of Mr. W. J. Westhoven. The singers had devoted over eight months to the preparation of the work, and an interpretation of considerable expressiveness and finish resulted. The solo music was sung by Miss Waugh, Mrs. Blanchard, Mr. P. Roxby, and Mr. Sidney Pick. On May 29 the new organ of the Cathedral was opened. Mr. J. H. Eales has been appointed organist.

SHEFFIELD.—The Sheffield University Musical Society has been formed, under the presidency of Dr. Henry Coward, for the cultivation of classical music and the practice of choral music under Dr. Coward's direction. The first work to be studied is Gluck's 'Orpheus.'

WELLINGTON (N.Z.).—At an interesting concert given by the Musical Society on May 5, the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's 'The Lorelei,' and Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' both of which were effectively performed under the direction of Mr. Alfred Worsley, the Society's new conductor. The principals were Madame Wieleart, Miss Eva Nixon, Miss Livingstone, and Mr. Frank Charlton. An orchestra accompanied.

Franz Mikorey, Hermann Suter, Fritz Steinbach, Peter Raabe, and Ernst von Schuch.—The Swedish male choir 'Orphei Drängar' have given two most successful concerts. The programmes consisted chiefly of music by Swedish composers, the music of Alfvén, Bellman, Berg, Lindblad, Liljefors, Ohlson Palmgren, Petsche, Södermann, and Widen being represented.

BETHLEHEM, PA.

A performance of the B minor Mass was the central feature of a two-days' Bach Festival given here in June. The Bach Choir had never been heard to better effect, and the playing of an orchestra of sixty added to the impressiveness of the occasion. Dr. J. Fred Wolle conducted.

BREMEN.

Great success was recently achieved by the Finnish male choir, 'Suomen Laulu.' Under the direction of M. Klemetti they performed an interesting programme including among other things Palestrina's motet 'Ad te levavi,' Adornatus te' by Corsi, Sibelius's 'Kahnfahrt,' 'In der Wildnis' by Palmgren, and Klemetti's 'Die Sterne leuchten hell.'

BUENOS AYRES.

Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' was performed here on May 10 by a choir and orchestra of 200, under the direction of Mr. J. Hampden Wall. The occasion was one of rare interest, and it was highly successful. The soloists were Madame Johanna Oetkeing-Brocks, Mr. Oswald Manning, Madame Dora de Rosse, and Dr. Douglas W. Sibbald.

CASSEL.

Under the direction of Dr. Ernest Zulauf, Alfred Kaiser's opera, 'Theodor Körner,' was performed for the first time at the Municipal Theatre.

CHICAGO.

Under the direction of Mr. Frederick Stock, Paul Ertel's Symphonic-poem 'Die nächtliche Heerschau' was performed for the first time by the Thomas Orchestra.

COLOGNE.

The eighty-ninth Lower Rhine Musical Festival took place on June 8-10 with great success. Three orchestral concerts were given. The sensational feature of the proceedings was a performance of Gustav Mahler's stupendous eighth Symphony for solo voices, chorus and a very large orchestra. Beethoven's ninth Symphony, Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and his 'Gesang der Parzen,' proved, however, the chief attractions in a carefully chosen programme. The Festival choir consisted of the combined choirs of the 'Gürzenich' concerts and the Städtischer Gesangverein from Aix-la-Chapelle. Generalmusikdirector Fritz Steinbach, conductor of the Festival, was much fêted. The list of the soloists included the names of Mesdames Foerstel, Philipp, Cahnbley-Hinken, Erler-Schnaudt, Lindenberg, Edyth Walker, and Messrs. Eugen d'Albert, Bronislaw Hubermann, Nieratsky, and Paul Bender.

DESSAU.

The last season has been one of uncommon musical activity. At the opera Woikowsky-Biedau's 'Das Nothend,' Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos,' 'Der Bärenhütter' by Siegfried Wagner, and Puccini's 'La Bohème' were all given for the first time. Otto Taubmann's 'Deutsche Messe,' Felix Draeseke's 'Osterszene,' Mahler's fourth Symphony, the Symphonic-poem 'Hunnenschlacht,' by Liszt, Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Scheherazade,' Noren's 'Kaleidoskop,' and the Overture to 'Herzog Wildfang,' by Siegfried Wagner, figured in the programmes of the symphony concerts given by the Court Orchestra, under the conductorship of Herr Franz Mikorey.

DORTMUND.

Gabriel Pierné's interesting oratorio, 'Franz von Assisi' was given for the first time under the direction of Prof. Janssen.

Foreign Notes.

BERLIN.

Towards the end of the season Goldmark's opera 'Die Königin von Saba' was revived at the Deutsches Opernhaus. Next season Thuille's 'Lobetanz,' 'Monsieur Bonaparte,' by Bogumil Zepler, and V. von Woikowsky-Biedau's 'Das Nothend' are to be given for the first time. Revivals of Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis' (in Richard Wagner's version), Mehul's 'Joseph in Aegypten,' Cherubini's 'Der Wasserträger,' Auber's 'Fra Diavolo,' and 'Undine,' by Lortzing, are also promised.—Four festival concerts devoted to works by Beethoven were given under the direction of Herr Mengelberg.—Another festival, given under the auspices of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musiker-Verband and the Deutscher Orchesterbund, took place during June 21-29. Seven concerts were given by different orchestras of an average strength of 200 performers. Besides well-known classical works the programmes included Scheinpfug's 'Overture to a Shakespearean Comedy,' Op. 15, Hans Huber's sixth Symphony, a Symphony in C minor by Gustav Cords, Georg Schumann's Overture 'Lebensfreude,' 'Waldwanderung,' by Leo Blech, Hausegger's 'Barbarossa' Symphony, Humperdinck's 'Maurische Rhapsodie,' the Symphonic-poems 'Les Preludes,' 'Mazeppa,' and 'Orpheus' by Liszt, Bruckner's fourth Symphony, and a Concerto for two orchestras by Handel. Among the conductors were Messrs. Albert Gortler, Bruno Walter, Georg Schumann, Corbach Abendroth, Siegmund von Hausegger, Scheinpfug,

DRESDEN-HELLERAU.

The outstanding feature of this year's 'School Festival' at the Jaques-Dalcroze Institute for rhythmic gymnastics was a performance of Gluck's 'Orpheus.' The whole production was a thing of rare beauty both from a musical and spectacular point of view, and showed the inspiring influence of the method on the pupils' musical sense and its power to uplift conventional ballet dancing.

EISENACH.

Under the auspices of the new Bach Society a Bach Festival is planned for September 17-18.

FRANKFURT.

The ballet 'Les petits riens,' with music by Mozart, was recently given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre.

HAGEN.

An interesting feature of the sixth municipal symphony concert (conductor, Prof. Laugs) was the production of Max Marschall's 'Nachtmusik.'

HAMBURG.

Friedrich Klose's Symphonic-poem 'Das Leben ein Traum' was played under the direction of Herr Siegmund von Hausegger at the tenth Philharmonic Concert.—Madame Ilse Fromm recently gave the first performance of Cyril Scott's Pianoforte sonata, Op. 66.

KÖNIGSBERG.

A new cantata, 'An Deutschlands Kaiser,' for children's voices, male chorus, female solo voices, solo violin, and wind and brass instruments, by Frantz Notz, has been successfully produced.

LA ROCHELLE.

A notable and excellent performance of Gounod's 'Mors et Vita' was given at the Cathedral on June 24 before a crowded congregation. The conductor was M. Jean Gounod, son of the composer.

The Singakademie (conductor, Herr Wohlgemuth) recently gave a fine performance of Sgambati's 'Requiem.'

MAGDEBURG.

Among the most interesting recent events have been performances of Krug-Waldsee's dramatic cantata 'König Rother,' his Violin sonata, and a String quartet in D minor by Kauffmann.

MUNICH.

The programmes of the Festival performances at the Prinzregenten Theater and the Residenz Theater have now been fixed. The scheme includes three cycles of Wagner's 'Der Ring des Nibelungen,' four performances of 'Die Meistersinger,' and one of 'Tristan und Isolde.' Mozart will be represented by 'Don Giovanni,' 'The marriage of Figaro,' and 'Die Zauberflöte.' Performances will also be given of Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos.'

ST. GALLEN.

The fourteenth Swiss Musical Festival took place during the days of June 14, 15. Two orchestral and two chamber music concerts were given. Among the compositions heard were a Violin sonata by Paul Miche, Othmar Schoeck's String quartet in D major, Op. 25, a Suite for orchestra by Frank Martin, Stavenhagen's new Pianoforte concerto, Symphonies by Gagnebin and Dr. Hans Huber, a 'Stabat Mater' for five solo voices and a cappella choir by L. Piantoni, 'Totenzug' by Carl Vogler, von Glöck's Violin concerto, a Symphonic phantasy (after Goethe's 'Totentanz') by Robert P. Denzler, Hans Lavater's 'Bergpsalm' for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, and the Symphonic-poem, 'Die erste Walpurgisnacht' for solo voices, chorus, and large orchestra, by Hermann Suter. Nearly every Swiss musician of note took part in the Festival as composer, performer, or conductor.

VIENNA.

Among the novelties performed at the last concerts of the Tonkünstlerorchester were a Concert overture by Szymanowski, Joseph Suk's Serenade for string orchestra in E major, Novak's Symphonic-poem 'Auf der hohen Tatra,' and Richard Mandl's Symphonic-rhapsody 'In den Strassen Algiers.'—Verdi's 'Falstaff' was recently revived at the Imperial Court Opera.

PARIS.

Under the direction of Mr. Thomas Beecham and Herr Oskar Fried, interesting works by Vaughan Williams, Delius, Debussy, Ravel, Stravinsky, Casella, and Arnold Schönberg (an excerpt from his choral 'Gurrelieder') were recently played for the first time at concerts at the Châtelet Theatre, given under the auspices of the 'Société des grandes auditions en France.'

Miscellaneous.

The following official communication from the Executive Committee of the Ghent Exhibition has been received by Dr. Charles Harris: 'It is one of the Executive Committee's most agreeable duties we are discharging this day in thanking the members of the Imperial Choir of London for their visit to the Ghent World's Fair. We have appreciated to the fullest extent the zeal and courage of your performers who did not fear to add the fatigue of two concerts to that long night voyage. We have also admired the perfect art with which the programmes have been executed, and it is unanimously agreed that the splendid concerts of May 31 and June 1 are to be marked in golden letters in the musical records of our Exhibition. Our Committee trust that, notwithstanding certain incidents for which they are not responsible and which they are first to regret, the members of the Imperial Choir will have brought away a pleasant souvenir of their stay in Ghent. The Imperial Choir follows a beautiful and noble end, namely, to strengthen the bonds of friendship and goodwill between the British Empire and the other nations, which end they have attained in Ghent with the greatest success and splendour. Are we permitted to hope that when, in 1915, the Centenary of the Peace between Great Britain and the United States of America will be celebrated in Ghent, we may count on the sympathetic co-operation of the powerful choir of which you are the eminent conductor?'

The annual 'Musicians' Holiday' of the Home Music Study Union will be held this year at the Red House, Portballintrae, Co. Antrim, from August 30 to September 13. The holiday chairman will be Mr. Percy A. Scholes, as in previous years. The secretary is Mr. J. W. Garbutt, 105, Cyprus Street, Stretford, Manchester. The lecturers will be Miss Mary Neal, Miss Blanche Payling, Mrs. Milligan-Fox, Monsieur M.-D. Calvocoressi, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, Mr. W. A. Traill, Mr. David Penrith, and Mr. Scholes.

The London School of Opera, under the management of Messrs. Grünebaum and Fairbairn, now possesses a home, named 'Cosmopolis,' that provides a small theatre as a practical training ground for students. Public inspection of the progress of the School was invited on June 23, when the final scene of Ponchielli's 'La Gioconda,' and the last two acts of Puccini's 'Madam Butterfly' were given; and on July 5, when the programme consisted of acts from 'La Bohème,' and 'Samson et Dalila' and the Mad Scene from 'Hamlet.'

Mr. Ostrovsky has completed, after eighteen years of study, a complicated mechanical device for giving flexibility, suppleness, and strength to the hand for the purposes of musical execution. On June 19, at a demonstration of his system, he explained the use of the instrument—a kind of massage treatment—and showed how safety from every possibility of physical harm was ensured. The method is a preparation, and not a substitute, for technical study.

The Royal Society of Musicians held their 175th anniversary festival dinner on June 26, under the presidency of the Earl of Donoughmore. It was announced that last year the Society distributed £4,743 for the relief of musicians in distress. In aid of the Society's funds a performance of 'The Messiah' was given by the Royal Choral Society at Westminster Abbey on July 9, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge.

As already announced in these columns, Mr. Raymond Roze has arranged to give an autumn season of opera in English at Covent Garden, commencing on November 1, with the first performance of his opera, 'Joan of Arc.' We are also informed that the same work will be performed at the Paris Opera House in May, 1914, in connection with the national Joan of Arc celebrations.

The work of the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall, was exhibited at an open-air function on July 3. In a nearly all-British programme the band of students showed of what fine effects of tone, nuance and expression the military band is capable even in a tutulary stage. The work of conducting was shared by Major Stretton and several of the students, who, as future bandmasters, are trained in this art.

A pianoforte recital and demonstration, under the direction of Miss O'Neill, was given at the Hall, Leigh Road, Highbury, on July 9. A feature of interest was the proficiency in harmonizing at sight and 'impromptu modulation shown by members of the ear-culture and harmony classes. Miss Gertrude Aston sang, and Miss O'Neill played Liszt's third Concert-study.

Mr. William Woodall, conductor of the Stourbridge Male-Voice Society, has been appointed conductor of the North Staffordshire District Choral Society, Mr. Herbert Whittaker, of Blackpool, having resigned owing to the pressure of other work. We regret to record the death (on May 12) of Mr. F. W. Meir, the genial secretary of the Society. Mr. S. A. Wood has been appointed joint-secretary.

The new music wing at St. Paul's School for Girls was recently opened by the Rev. E. S. Palmer, Master of the Musicians' Company. At the opening ceremony, Mr. Gustav von Holtz's music of 'The vision of Dame Christian' was performed by the school choir and orchestra, and an address was delivered by Sir Alexander Mackenzie.

The Granville Humphreys Choir, a body of some fifty singers, gave a concert at the Crystal Palace on July 19. Miss Elsie Bennett, Miss Marian Battishill, Mr. Emlyn Edwards, and Mr. Robert Pitt (vocalists), and Mr. J. B. Robinson (violin), also contributed to the programme. Mr. Granville Humphreys conducted.

An interesting entertainment given by Miss Florence von Etlinger's Operatic and Dramatic School, on July 14, exemplified the varied scope of the work of the institution. Besides operatic work there were French reciting and acting, dancing (under the direction of Miss Ruby Ginner), singing, and the enactment of a scene from 'Romeo and Juliet.'

We are informed that the Gwent Welsh Male-Voice Choir have returned after a successful nine months' tour of America, during which they had the honour of singing before the President of the United States and Mrs. Wilson, at the White House.

On the occasion of the concert given at the Crystal Palace on June 11 (reported in our July number, p. 478), Dr. Charles Harris was presented with a Silver Loving Cup subscribed for by members of the choir. The inscription on the cup utilised the phrase of the day, 'What are you doing?'

The national demonstration of the National Union of School Orchestras took place at the Crystal Palace on June 21, when 6,200 violinists, forming two orchestras—advanced and intermediate, were heard under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill.

The fifty-sixth annual Festival of the Tonic Sol-fa Association took place at the Crystal Palace on June 28. The conductor of the junior choir was Mr. Alfred Sears; Dr. Henry Coward conducted the adult choir and adjudicated in the competitions.

His Majesty The King has been graciously pleased to confer the Officers' Decoration upon Lieut.-Colonel George Dixon, 5th Battalion, The Border Regiment.—London Gazette, June 20, 1913.

The fête of the National Temperance Choral Union at the Crystal Palace, on July 12, was a brilliant success, great numbers taking part. The results of the competitions are given in the Competition Festival Record.

We learn from the Athenæum that Dr. Richard Strauss has set a poem by Friedrich Rückert to music for four solo voices and a cappella choir, under the title of 'Deutsche Motette.'

A Conference on Musical Education, similar to that of last year, will be held at St. Paul's Girls' School, Brook Green, Hammersmith, on January 5-10, 1914.

A lecture-demonstration of the art of timpani-playing was given by Mr. Gabriel G. Cleather at Bridgewater House, on July 3.

Mr. J. H. G. Baughan has retired from the editorship of the Musical Standard, and is succeeded by Mr. Wallace L. Crowley.

Dr. Vogt, conductor of the famous Mendelssohn Choir, has been appointed to succeed the late Dr. Fisher as Principal of the Toronto Conservatory of Music.

A dramatic ballet, 'The foam bride' ('Meereslauchten'), by Mrs. Adela Maddison, has been accepted by Dr. Loewenfeld for performance at Hamburg next season.

A presentation of thirty guineas was made on June 27 to Mr. H. M. Jackson, who has been organist of St. James's Church, Wollaston, for forty-five years.

The town of Girvan has honoured the memory of William Jackson, a composer who died there forty years ago, by erecting a memorial in the graveyard where he was buried.

Miss Beryl Reeves has won the 'Fanny Davies' prize at the Francis Holland Conservatorium of Music, 39, Graham Street, S.W.

Mr. C. E. Tinney has been appointed Professor of Singing at the Royal Irish Academy of Music, Dublin.

Mr. Daniel Mayer announces a Beethoven Festival in London in April next.

Mr. H. Mason, clarinetist, has received the first award of the British Musicians' Pension Society.

Mr. H. Leslie Smith has been appointed musical director to the Barnes Operatic and Dramatic Society.

Answers to Correspondents.

R. E.—You do not state what instrument you play. If the pianoforte, and you actually suffer from 'loss of control over the muscles,' besides great weakness, it would be best to seek medical advice. If the hands and arms tire too soon, it generally suggests wrong use of muscles and muscular rigidity; in this case the personal advice of a teacher working on modern rational lines would be advisable. 'Rotary exercises' are very useful. See the reference to a new method on p. 544.

W. W.—Maurice Ravel is one of the leaders of the modern school in France. Born at Ciboure in 1875, he proceeded to the Conservatoire de Paris, where he studied composition under Fauré. His individuality was manifested early, and the publication of the F major Quartet first spread his fame. He has written no large work. His music is distinguished by its finesse, Gallic wit, and advanced harmonic manner.

A. NEWTON.—We cannot trace the tunes you name. The 'School Sight-Singing Reader,' Book 226, Novello's School Songs, 1s., would help you. Of course a teacher would be an advantage.

G. F. B.—M. Edgar Tinel died at Brussels on October 28 last year. He is succeeded by M. Léon Dubois.

A MANUAL OF PLAINSONG

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED THE PSALTER NOTED

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainsong, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainsong. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainsong during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

The Canticles noted to Gregorian Tones, together with the Litany and Responses from the above, 1s. Net.

OFFICE OF HOLY COMMUNION IN G, FOR MEN'S VOICES.

"Dr. Bunnett's admirable little service supplies a want which has often been felt. It is the work of a devout English Churchman, whose musical experience is ripe with the maturity of many years spent in the service of the sanctuary. It is, moreover, complete, containing as it does all the musical requirements of the present Prayer Book; we venture to hope that it may find a wide acceptance in choirs and places where they sing the Divine Office in the absence of boy-chorists."—Organist and Choirmaster.

A SECOND SET OF 12 SHORT PIECES FOR THE ORGAN.

"These delightful little compositions will be gladly welcomed by teachers requiring easy pieces for beginners suitable for performance in church as voluntaries. We heartily recommend them. Introduction, Air with Variations, and Fugue Fugato for organ. The Norwich Organist, if he has somewhat copied the title of a well-known organ piece by H. Smart has most certainly steered remarkably clear of that piece in both conception and development of his theme—the Air (B flat) might easily pass for one bearing the name of Joseph Haydn, so charmingly beautiful is it. The Fugue shows some clever and musically treatment of the Air."—Organist and Choirmaster.

BY A. H. ALLEN.

"BLESSED ARE THEY THAT MOURN."

Motet for Chorus and Organ.

"A. H. Allen's motet, 'Blessed are they that mourn,' is the work of an excellent musician, and deserves to be known."—Morning Post, February 14, 1906.

"This is an interesting work, sincere in expression and technically well-devised. The influence of Brahms is somewhat strong; but Mr. Allen has a good deal to say for himself, and he says it in a manner that is thoroughly musically. The motet should be a welcome addition to the repertoire of church choirs with ideas above Dykes and Barnby."—Oxford Magazine, January 24, 1906.

Price Fourpence.

EDWARD OXENFORD

ALFRED R. GAUL

SUITABLE FOR

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

A VALUABLE BOOK FOR TEACHERS AND STUDENTS.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, &c. cetera.

The

No. 61.

A matter of considerable importance may soon have to engage the attention of promoters of Competitive Festivals. In France and in other countries there exist powerful Societies of composers and publishers holding corporately the performing rights of all the music composed by their members. These Societies undertake the onerous task of collecting fees for performances, which they distribute in certain agreed proportions amongst the various interests concerned. In this way the French Society alone dealt last year with as much as £200,000. It is now proposed to establish a similar Society in Great Britain. If the proposal is successful the scope of the scheme may be held to apply to the performance of all copyright pieces by every choir that takes part in a competition, to say nothing of performances at ordinary choral concerts. This prospect is not an attractive one from the consumer's standpoint, and if it is realised it will, we imagine, breed much trouble. It is a question whether some united action should be taken, before it is too late, to represent the interests of choral Societies and Competitive Festivals in the discussions that are now taking place.

BOURNVILLE.—June 28.

A choral competition open to all England, held in this charming locality on the above date, was remarkably well attended. The entries included eight mixed quartets, fourteen male quartets, thirteen female-voice choirs, thirteen mixed-voice choirs, and the astonishing number of twenty-three male-voice choirs. There was an audience of about seven thousand persons, who followed the proceedings with great interest. The event took place in the open, in the beautiful grounds of the village. The spot was well chosen because, being on the brow of a hill, everyone present could see and hear.

The first-prize winners were as follows:—Mixed quartet, the Mafford party; male quartet, 'Four from Brockmoor'; female-voice choirs (test: 'Ye banks and braes,' arranged by Percy Fletcher): Astwood Bank (Mr. A. J. Hodges); mixed choirs (test: 'Hymn to music,' by Dudley Buck): Ten Acres and Stinchley Co-operative Society (Mr. W. Leech); male-voice choirs (test: 'The Beleaguered,' by Sullivan): Cradley and Old Hill (Mr. A. Hickman). Dr. McNaught adjudicated, and conducted the combined choirs in their several pieces. Several members of the Cadbury family were present. On the evenings of the previous two days (June 26 and 27) there were numerous competitions amongst competitors belonging to the Bournville works, at which Dr. A. T. Silver adjudicated.

THE PITTSBURG EISTEDDFOD.—July.

This gathering in the States was very successful, notwithstanding great heat which led male competitors and judges to work in their shirtsleeves. The event was an open one, but only one choir came from this side—the Rhondda Male-Voice Choir, under Mr. John Phillips. It was no little reward to them for their great enterprise that they gained the chief male-voice prize. Twenty children's choirs sang, most of them, according to report, somewhat harshly, voice-production not having been studied. Canton (Ohio) Ladies' Choir were first in their class. Scranton United Choral won the chief mixed-voice choir prize, $5,000 (nearly £1,100). Their performance of 'The challenge of Thor' and 'A little bird in the air,' both from Elgar's 'King Olaf,' was—it is declared by Dr. Vaughan Thomas (in the Manchester Guardian)—equal to the best to be heard in the 'old country.' The adjudicators were Dr. Vaughan Thomas, Dr. Protheroe, and Mr. Krehbiel.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR FESTIVAL, CRYSTAL PALACE.—July 5.

This Festival was the 25th anniversary of the Nonconformist Choir Union, and, to mark the occasion, the executive contributed twenty-five guineas to the Lord Mayor's Fund for the purchase of the Crystal Palace, the venue of many successful Festivals. Over two hundred Free Churches sent their choirs to the Palace to assist in the celebration, and fourteen competed in the choral competitions, arranged in two sections, (a) large choirs, and (b) small choirs, Mr. George Dodds adjudicating. His awards were as follows:—

- (a) 1st. Finchley Presbyterian.
- 2nd. Matlock Primitive Methodist.
- (b) 1st. Trinity Congregational, St. Albans.
- 2nd. Tonbridge Wesleyan.

Mr. E. Minshall, president and founder of the Union, presented the prizes.

Solo competitions were held at night, Mr. Dan Price being the judge. There were numerous entries, and the competition was keen. The prize-winners were:

SOPRANO.

- 1st. Kathleen Bishop, Ebenezer Congregational, Chatham.
- 2nd. Lily Marston, Dawes Road Congregational, Fulham.

- 1st. Amy Whitehorn, Harringay Congregational.
- 2nd. Emily Taylor, Warrington Wesleyan.

TENOR.

- 1st. W. Rees Dier, Ebenezer Congregational, Chatham.
- 2nd. Joseph Green, Wolverhampton Wesleyan.

BASS.

- 1st. H. B. Jones, Wolverhampton Wesleyan.
- 2nd. L. Ford, Peckham Park Road Baptist.

Mr. A. L. Cowley, a vice-president, presented the prizes.

A well-balanced choir of 4,350 voices, assisted by the full orchestra of the Union, gave effective performances of a number of sacred and secular items, and choral-singing in its highest development was the result. Mr. Frank Idle conducted for the fourth year in succession, and he is to be congratulated on a successful performance. It is no light task to keep such a vast choir under control, but it was not beyond Mr. Idle's undoubted powers. Especially was this noticeable in the lighter items—'My bonnie lass' (German), 'Winter days' (Caldicott), and 'Puck is King,' a charming part-song of Mr. Idle's own composition. The singing of the sacred items, 'All men all things,' and 'And then shall your light' (Mendelssohn), and 'Lovely appear' (Gounod) was very impressive, the tone being broad and harmonious. Mr. J. A. Meale accompanied the items on the great organ with his customary ability. Miss Ada Forrest sang with true artistic feeling, and she had a splendid reception.

THE ASSOCIATION OF MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

The ninth annual Conference of this Association was held on June 27 and 28 at Leeds, at the University, which was kindly lent for the occasion by the authorities. This was the first time the Association had met out of London, and it is worthy of note that the gathering was the best attended of the whole series of meetings.

The proceedings began on the morning of June 27, Lady Mary Trefusis presiding. Mr. M. E. Sadler, the vice-chancellor of the University, extended a welcome to the members. He said the place of music in national education was growing more important year by year, and as the social side of education presented itself to them as one of the chief aspects of educational work, they felt how necessary it was in every grade of education, from the earliest to the most advanced, that music in the larger sense of the word should take a place. For what the Association was doing to cultivate the musical taste of England, and draw together those who were interested in its advancement, they at that University, in common with all busy with education, desired to tender their thanks.

Lady Mary Trefusis, in some remarks upon the objects of the Association, said that all who had been connected with the competitions in any way were, she thought, unanimous as to their worth, whether they looked at them from the musical, educational, or social point of view. She referred with sorrow to the loss the cause had sustained in the death of the honorary co-secretary, Miss Mary Egerton, of York. She proposed the following resolution:

'That the members of this Conference of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals wish to place on record their deep sorrow and regret at the death of their hon. secretary, Miss Mary Egerton, and to express to her relations their sincere and heartfelt sympathy.'

This was carried in silence, the whole of the members standing.

Dr. McNaught also spoke of the objects of the Association. He said:

'When it was proposed to hold our annual Conference at Leeds I felt dubious as to the propriety of our coming to a quarter of England so long and justly famous for its choral singing. It seemed to me that the Association had nothing to offer musical educationists beyond an advocacy of the competitive principle as an interesting stimulus to musical study, and as a means of social amelioration. Musical knowledge and skill are widespread in Yorkshire and Lancashire, and so far as choral technique and fine interpretation are matters of concern we are here to seek enlightenment.'

'Competitions are no new thing in the North of England and the Midlands. Many of your excellent small organizations have acquired their high standard in the severe school of keenly contested performance. Our Association is young compared with the age of the movement in the North. Only lately I came across the syllabus of a competitive Festival held on a somewhat large scale at Middlesbrough in 1879, and I was informed that similar events had happened there since 1865. Workington, in Cumberland, came into the field about 1872, and has therefore a claim to be regarded as one of the oldest Festivals. These events are the direct descendants of the Welsh Eisteddfod, for they are both promoted by Welshmen.'

'While on the question of dates it will be fair to give credit to the competitive enterprise organized by Mr. Willert Beale at the Crystal Palace in 1872, under the title of "National music meetings." These meetings, mind you, were in the much maligned South, but they made a wide appeal. It was at one of these notable gatherings that I obtained my first personal experience of musical competition. Although youthful, I was bold enough to take a choir of 150 voices from the East End of London to the 1873 meeting. Stratford in East London followed ten years later, in 1882, and then in 1885 Miss Wakefield's effort at Kendal—by far the most wonderfully pregnant event of its kind—came into being. We who revere her memory make no claim that Miss Wakefield invented the idea of choral competitions, but we do claim that it was owing to her musical insight, her indomitable perseverance, her impelling force of character, that made competition Festivals in this country a missionary movement. She placed the competitive idea on a high and almost austere plane of endeavour. No one saw more clearly than did she its seamy side. She weighed all the advantages and disadvantages of the competitive principle, and found that the balance in all the circumstances of the situation inclined heavily in its favour.

'We are here to-day to pick up all we can as to ways and means and objectives. We strive to make our Festival not only a musical uplifting but, in addition, through the marvellous power of music, a great moral uplifting. The scope of competition Festivals is as universal as the appeal of music itself. We cater for the infant school with its action-song developing the rhythmic instinct, right through a long path to the splendid unit formed by the finely trained choir presenting those exquisite miniatures in part-music which are among the most precious possessions of musical literature. We aim to get at the village folk in order to provide them with a delightful occupation in the dull winter time, we want the working-class girl, the factory operative, the workman and his family to forget sordid surroundings, and to find beauty and refreshment in song.

'It is because we are convinced by ample experience that the movement we promote is a social, moral, and patriotic force as well as a unique musical educational means that we appeal to social powers to support us. We know no sects, no politics, no social cleavage. It is always possible to attack the competitive idea with some show of superior reason. But respectfully we ask those critics who may be disposed to meticulously examine our methods to tell us at the same time precisely how we are to secure our ends by some better way. No one, however dubious, can deny the amazing progress the movement has made, the extraordinary ability it has brought to recognition, the influence it has exerted on tens of thousands of persons in town and country. I estimate that at least 100,000 persons have been concerned in competitions at Festivals during the past year. If any other scheme will set this number to work hard at musical practice, we shall be glad to know of it.'

CHOICE OF MUSIC FOR COMPETITION.

In an interesting address upon this topic, Dr. Hadow, Principal of Armstrong College, Newcastle, said he had been examining the book issued by the Association, which contained lists of music performed at various Festivals, and while he found that there was a considerable number of works of undoubted first-rate value, not all perhaps equally suitable, but all in their way of a high artistic level, the scale went down until at the bottom they came across works which could only pass muster in that sort of twilight of judgment through which they saw most of their musical Festivals. He gathered that one of the main dangers against which they had to strive was not that the members of the choosing committee came with too few ideas, but with too many. The music to be selected should be correlated very carefully to what the committee knew to be the capacity of the choirs in the district. If there was any doubt as to whether a work was too difficult or not the peg should be screwed up a little rather than down. What competitive Festivals stood for more than anything else was the stimulating of taste for what was best throughout the country, serving as a breakwater against that flood of vulgarity and triviality which every now and then tended to swamp them. He was afraid that it was becoming true that England was the country to which bad American tunes came when they died.

It was, he said, a great pity, because America just now was developing an extremely interesting school of native music; but the intellectual freedom of that great country seemed to carry with it an entire absence of any sort of prohibitive and restrictive standard. The result was half-educated religions, quarter-educated philosophies, and tunes of no education at all which came over here by every shipload, and we accepted them: partly with that kind of stolid indifference which is one of our national characteristics, and which did not seem to mind what was happening so long as something was happening, and partly out of that sense of small schoolboy mischief which was rather at the bottom of most of us, and which rejoiced in seeing people shocked. At any rate, we were in periodic danger of being swamped by—he could not call it music—but stuff written on music paper. For competition Festivals nothing should be selected which was not known to be of first-rate quality, and he also suggested that the choice should be a little more systematised than at present. They were, too, a little bit inclined to take a new thing because it was new. The more they could keep abreast of modern developments the better, but they ought to keep proper step. In their selecting they should try to keep up some kind of historical continuity. They should not be afraid of repeating works. As to the choice between English music and that of Continental countries, the best of our English music should form a large part; but that did not mean they were to keep out great composers from outside. There was one work which every Festival should take care to perform at their combined choral concert, and that was Handel's 'Acis and Galatea.'

Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland read a paper on 'The local effects of competitions,' the report of which is held over to our next issue.

In the course of a discussion, Mr. T. P. Sykes, of Bradford, a well-known school teacher, declared himself against competitions for school children, but he was not supported by the audience.

At the afternoon session Mr. Herbert Thompson (Leeds) spoke upon the subject of 'Money prizes.' He thought that money prizes ought to be, if not abolished, at any rate carefully looked after. It seemed to him that the greatest difficulty that promoters of Festivals had to contend with was the tendency of all English people to turn everything into sport, to regard sport as the only serious matter of life, excepting possibly their business. Emulation, one realised, was an essential part of musical Festivals, but as soon as competition was undertaken for the sake of competition then he thought a wrong element had crept in. He had been told of choral Societies in the West Riding which had had to give up their efforts because their male members were too busy with competition works to take part in choral works. That was a very unwholesome state of affairs. The distinction was between legitimate competition and 'pot-hunting,' as it was commonly called. Valuable prizes must to a certain extent encourage the unwholesome state of things which might or might not be called 'pot-hunting.' He thought the money spent on prizes might far better be employed in a method of giving grants of money in aid of expenses. He would not have grants given absolutely in proportion to the excellence of the performance, though a certain standard would have to be reached before a grant was made, but in proportion to the expenses of the choir.

A letter from the Rev. T. Topham, of Wensleydale, was read, in which he stated that at the Festival in that district there had been no falling off of entries since money prizes had been abandoned. A long and ably-written letter from Mr. Lionel H. Franceys, of the Blackpool Festival, was also read. He showed that the relation of the amount of the highest money prizes given at Blackpool to the travelling expenses incurred by choirs coming from a distance proved that the entries were not made with a view to profit. He strongly defended the system in open classes, and pleaded that the discussion should be dropped so far as it was directed against choirs whose main motives were artistic.

Mr. H. A. Fricker (Leeds City Organist), in speaking upon 'Instrumental music in competitions,' said the great predominance of vocal entries at Festivals and the very small entries in the instrumental classes were far from satisfactory. Each city should have at least one full orchestra.

Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson (organist of Manchester Cathedral) read a lengthy and important paper on 'Church and chapel choirs in town and village in relation to the Festival movement,' in which he made some excellent practical proposals born of his experience with choirs and the working of competition Festivals. We hope to give a fuller account in our next issue.

Dr. McNaught spoke of the advantage of the competition movement in connection with girls' clubs. He referred to the work of the London Working Girls' Clubs, the St. Cecilia Club, London, and other similar organizations at Aberdeen, Carlisle, Morecambe, Belfast, and elsewhere.

SECOND DAY.

Mr. W. Godson (the Leeds School Music superintendent) spoke on 'Some points in a school singing lesson.' It was a lively address that roved over a wide ground. He referred to the Dalcroze Rhythmic Gymnastics as not being useful in elementary schools. Breathing, vocal tone, sight-singing, ear-training, execution of songs were topics all tersely dealt with. He announced himself as a whole-hearted believer in tonic sol-fa, and said emphatically that if the Board of Education got rid of the system they would be taking away valuable tools from the teachers. As to 'all staff notation,' he said he would undertake to teach a class of ignoramuses sol-fa and staff quicker than any other teacher could teach the staff alone. Once a quarter a concert of good music should be performed to the school class. No elaborate voice exercises were necessary in the school. Placing the voices was sufficient; the vowels should be shaped, and forcing stopped. Illustrations were given by a class of boys from Quarry Mount Council School (Mr. H. Exley); and the following school choirs contributed items: Blenheim Girls (Miss Frances Brooks); Lower Wortley Boys (Mr. Tom Morton); Queen's Road Mixed (Mr. W. C. Cockram).

Mr. Geoffrey Shaw spoke on the choice of music for schools and the importance of sight-reading for children. He said that it was not bad music that did the harm so much as the insipid stuff that was neither very bad nor very good. National and folk-songs should first be chosen, and then music by the great masters. The Board of Education wished to encourage both staff and tonic sol-fa.

TECHNIQUE IN CONDUCTING.

By Dr. Bairstow.

Before considering the question of technique, he said, it would be necessary to arrive at some conclusion as to what was an ideal conductor.

In his opinion, in addition to controlling the tempi, the conductor should, by his gestures and facial expression, without loss of dignity, and without exaggeration, interpret the spirit, mood, atmosphere, and emotions of the music. To make this possible his nerves and muscles should respond instantly to the conception of movement formed in the brain.

The conductor was the commander of the ship; all depended on him. Therefore he must not by his deportment convey an apologetic or undignified expression, but must stand erect, the chest expanded, the back straight, the knees braced, and the whole body tense but not rigid—steel, but not cast-iron. He must not stoop over the music: orchestra, choir, and audience would take him at his own valuation. If he showed signs of not being thoroughly acquainted with the music, they would get anxious. If he, by over-energetic passages which should be calm, or by any look or movement such as stamping, showed that he was not trusting those under his command, they would not trust themselves.

A light baton should be used, with a good balance, that was, heavier at the handle than at the point.

The next thing was the direction of the beats. This, like everything else, must be in close sympathy with the rhythm. He could not call to mind having seen any conductor beat the first beat of the bar in any other direction than downwards, for a person with but slight sense of rhythm felt that this was the strongest muscular movement, and that it must coincide with the strongest pulsation. The second strongest movement was to the right; more muscular energy could be imparted to a movement away from, than one towards, the body. This showed why it was wrong rhythmically to beat three in a bar—down, left, up; and four—down, right, left, up. The next beat in order of energy was to the left, for, although it was weaker muscularly, it was not against gravity. The weakest—the upward beat—like the strongest, was invariably done correctly. In beating six beats in compound time, the fourth should invariably be to the right. Where it was necessary to indicate the sub-divisions of the beats—the baton should move through far less space for the sub-divisions than for the beat itself. The danger in cases of this sort was to persuade the choir and orchestra to put more weight on the sub-divisions than these could safely bear, thus making the music dull, listless, and unintelligible.

The main questions for a conductor to put to himself were: 'Do my gestures express anything at all?' and, if so, 'Are they expressing just the right thing?' and if these could be answered in the affirmative, the last question was, 'Are these gestures the simplest, slightest, and most graceful that can be made to fit the purpose?'

The emotional side was harder to teach. Temperament, education, refinement, and human sympathy—in fact all the qualities that went to make an artist—entered into the question so largely that it would seem almost impossible to teach at all. But this was not the case. He was quite sure that experience helped him to express by gestures the music he conducted far better than was the case years ago.

A good conductor could be told from the movements of his left hand alone. He never moved it unnecessarily, but when he did one could see at once what he intended by the expressiveness of its gestures.

To sum up he said:

'By concentration, and the uplifting of the spirit to get into touch with the music, create a habit of quick action from the brain through the nerves to the muscles.

'Let deportment be as dignified and commanding as your position demands, remembering that people will judge you at your apparent valuation of yourself.

'Make as few beats in a bar as you dare, not as many as you can, because if you adopt the latter plan we shall see the spokes when the wheel is going round quickly. In other words, you will bring into prominence all the subsidiary accents.

'Do not use more energy than is absolutely necessary; give people the impression that you have plenty in reserve. Bear in mind where the main climaxes occur, and hold back for them.

'Try to get as much variation of action and gesture as you can from different muscular combinations, and apply the laws which govern muscular action in playing instruments and games to conducting.

'Do not feel as if you had only one joint in your arm, and that one at the shoulder.

'Above all, study the meaning of the words in vocal, and the emotional character in vocal and instrumental music, and make every detail subservient to this, and a means of realising it, remembering that pace, rhythm, phrasing, light and shade and colour are not the end itself, but the means to that end.'

Mr. Harty Evans, who followed Dr. Birstow, with the permission of Lady Mary Trefusis was allowed to put himself 'out of order' on the plea that much that had been said on the previous day deserved some more consideration. Prof. Hadow had given, as usual, a fascinating address, yet even he had given some of his listeners a sudden bump when he brought them to earth with the suggestion that 'Acis and Galatea' was the one perfect thing for the competition Festival. But most experienced critics would agree with his plea for the repetition of a great piece of music. Instances were well known of a great piece of music which at first was inadequately performed, but after a lapse of a few years the added experience of the choirs had made the same piece a joy to listen to. A feeling of pessimism was created yesterday, since the impression was left that not only was 'bad music' chosen, but that it was deliberately chosen! If an examination of last season's Festivals were made, it would be found that not only was there a great improvement but that comparatively little 'bad' music was chosen. Surely every one endeavoured to choose good music? A suggestion was made that a body of experts be elected to advise on the selection of music for the various competitions. But who were the experts? One expert would tell them that Beethoven had said the last word in music. Another, that good music died with Brahms! Then there was the expert who held that England has produced only one great composer—Purcell. On the other hand, we would be told by an expert that Elgar was the one and only English composer. Another would tell us that we could not have too much Bach and the Madrigals, but on all accounts to 'shun the fifth-rate music of Elgar!' What kind of a programme would these experts devise? Mr. Herbert Thompson made a most valuable suggestion with regard to the soloists—that they should prepare a group of songs, the judge to make the selection at the competition. That was probably the department where the pot-hunters were found. The big Festivals of Morecambe, Blackpool, and Birmingham found they must give money prizes, and it would be well not to discuss them any further. One only hoped that they would not increase the money prizes, as in the case of Welsh competitions. In Wales, when money prizes did not exceed £20 or £30, there were more choirs and conductors of ability than there were at present. Each district would work out its own salvation on the question of money prizes. Dr. Birstow had given an amusing and instructive paper on conducting, and it must be widely recognised that the competition movement had not only given us fine choirs, but also most admirable conductors—ladies and gentlemen who had proved themselves to be real artists. Who taught them? They taught themselves, and that was why we all wished that all conductors would follow their lead—find out what was necessary in the art of beating time to suggest the right accent, rhythm, and phrasing. Some conductors became slaves of the metronome and were more concerned with the pace—whether it was 84 or 88—than with the interpretation of the music! Perhaps some conductors were so concerned with the technique, that they left the real interpretation until the last moment. In his (Mr. Evans's) experience, it was far better to fire the imagination of the singers at the outset. Explain the poem, then play it over and emphasise the beauties of the musical setting. The next step was to let them learn the music in whole phrases before adding the words. This method made difficulties of notation and rhythm disappear to a great extent, and the singers had a goal to work for. Another advantage of this method was that the singers were encouraged to 'use their ears' and to sing into the harmony. Modern music, and certainly the music of the future, would probably demand more use of the ear than the eye! In spite of all criticism—and there was a danger of over-criticism by new critics who suddenly 'discovered the movement' and proceeded to advise that it all be pulled down and built up according to their views—the Competition Movement was the only 'live' movement in music in the country, and it had made good music the absolute need of a great many people.

Mr. Cecil Sharp read a paper on 'Folk-songs and dances,' in which he strongly advocated the inclusion of folk-dances in the schedules of musical competitions. A party of dancers from Retford gave an exhibition of folk-dances under the superintendence of Mr. Denman. We hope to give Mr. Sharp's paper in full in the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW for September.

The Conference was then brought to a close.

This Festival has quickly developed into a very popular event. Perhaps the pleasant situation of this seaside town has a good deal to do with this. It was only by working hard from 9 a.m. until late in the evening on each day that Dr. McNaught (who adjudicated in place of Mr. Harty Evans, who was temporarily indisposed) could get through the extraordinary number of entries. We can report only the results in the chief choral classes, in which ten well-equipped choirs appeared. The tests were Elgar's 'Weary Wind' and Parry's 'Come, pretty wag.' The Bradford Vocal Union (Mr. J. Barker) gave very fine performances of both pieces, the Garibaldi Choral Society (Mr. P. Wilson) was a very good second, and Scunthorpe Musical Union (Mr. J. H. Markham) followed close behind. The attendance of the public was excellent.

An important series of musical competitions is announced to be held at Olympia, London, W., between September 6 and 20, in connection with the British Music Exhibition, which is convened under the auspices of the Pianoforte Manufacturers' Association. There are open classes for solo singers of all kinds, pianoforte, violin, violoncello, organ, choral societies, church choirs, school and children's choirs. The prizes include thirteen grand and upright pianofortes by Broadwood and other first-rate makers, and there are shields and money prizes in other classes. The full syllabus can be obtained from Mr. Claude P. Landi, Secretary of Competitions, Exhibition Offices, 124, Holborn, E.C.

On June 25 a Conference of Conductors and Adjudicators was held at Morecambe in order to discuss suggestions for the 1914 Festival, which will be held on May 6, 7, 8, 9. There was a large attendance, some conductors coming from remote parts. Dr. Walford Davies, Mr. Harty Evans, and Mr. Fuller-Maitland addressed the meeting. Bach figured largely in the discussion. The Mass in B minor or a selection from it was proposed for combined performance.

MICHAEL D. CALVOCORESSI.

No one acquainted with the amazing and dazzling developments of the most modern music, and the embarrassing problems they present, can envy the lot of the musical critic who is expected to pronounce sapient judgments, place this and that music in its proper place in the evolutionary scheme of things, and stand between the creator and a sometimes much mystified public as a philosopher and guide to both parties. As history has proved, it is only too easy for critics to go astray and mistake views derived from their own personal limitations and inexpansive outlook for eternal principles. We remember a public discussion in which Mr. Bernard Shaw—the Mr. Shaw—took part, in which he was quite justly accused of wriggling. With a show of virtuous indignation he replied that he objected to be accused of wriggling when he was merely displaying intellectual flexibility. Now this convenient accomplishment, by whatever designation it is known, is an almost indispensable part of the equipment of the modern musical critic. But he must bring many other qualities and acquirements to bear on his delicate task. He must have an intimate knowledge of the achievements of the past and of the divergent streams of tendency now flowing over the chief musical countries in Europe, and for this purpose he must be placed in a great centre of musical activity. All these acquirements and advantages may be claimed for the subject of this sketch. M. M.-D. Calvocoressi is young, but notwithstanding his brief span, he has enjoyed unique experience, gained partly through an enviable gift of tongues that would have made him popular at the Tower of Babel. Then he brings a cool, judicial outlook, and facility and felicity of literary expression to bear upon and illuminate his criticisms. In this connection it may be interesting to note that it has rarely been found necessary to suggest alteration in the articles written in English by M. Calvocoressi for the Musical Times. As we know that his contributions have been read with attention and profit by our readers, we feel sure that they will welcome some particulars of his career.

Michael D. Calvocoressi was born at Marseilles, on October 2, 1877. His parents were both Greeks. In 1886 he went to Paris, and was educated there. He did not take up music until he was sixteen years of age; he then studied harmony with Xavier Leroux, and applied this knowledge himself to composition.

In 1902 he began to write musical criticism, first contributing to L'Art Moderne (Brussels), La Renaissance Latine, The Weekly Critical Review, Le Courrier Musical (Paris). During 1909-10 he was the musical critic for the daily Gil Blas, and he now holds a similar position on the fortnightly Comedia Illustré.

He has contributed articles to several Russian periodicals: one at Prague, one at Cracow (Cracovie), one in Roumania; also to several German musical periodicals, and to the New Music Review (New York). He is musical correspondent in Paris for the Morning Post and, as our readers are well aware, has of late years contributed frequently to the columns of the Musical Times. He has also written for other English musical newspapers.

As a lecturer he began his career at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales in 1905, the first course being on Russian Music, and he has continued to lecture year by year at this institution. Other subjects dealt with include the 'Origins of keyboard music' (1906), 'Greek Folk-song' (1907), 'Æsthetics of programme music' (1908), 'Musical criticism' (1909 and 1912), 'Edgar Allan Poë' (1909); and from 1910 onwards he devoted the course to the 'Tendencies of contemporary music.' He has also lectured to the Université Nouvelle (Brussels), the Société des Grandes Conférences, the Université des Annales (Paris), and the Conservatoire de Lyons, and in other cities in France.

He has written critical essays on Vincent d'Indy's 'L'Etranger' (Pamphlet, 1903); Liszt (Paris, Laurens, 1905); 'La Musique Russe' (Pamphlet, 1907); Moussorgsky (Paris, Alcan, 1908, amended edition, 1911); Glinka (Paris, Laurens, 1912); Schumann (Paris, Michaud, 1912). He has translated from German into French, Max Reger's 'Beiträge zur Modulationen'; Sviétlov's 'Le Ballet Contemporain,' a very important work. He is now engaged in translating into French another important Russian book, Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Treatise on orchestration'; also several hitherto untranslated writings of Poë, which will appear in book form this autumn.

A department of his activities in which his attainments enable him to specialize, is the provision of translations for use with vocal music. Those published include (from the Russian): Moussorgsky's songs into French; Balakirev, into French and English, some into German; Liapounov's songs into French and English, several into German; Stravinsky's into French, English, and German; Gretchaninov's into French, some into English; Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, 'The Golden Cockerel,' into French; (from the German), Hugo Kaun's cantata, 'Mother Earth,' into English; (from the French), songs by Fauré, Duparc, Debussy, Chausson, and others into English or German, or both; H. Fevrier's opera, 'Le Roi Aveugle,' into German.

He has done much to propagate Russian music in France, but he has felt it necessary to oppose the music of Tchaikovsky, because he considers its influence baneful. Until 1910 he ran M. Diaghilew's Russian seasons in Paris. In 1908, under this régime, 'Boris Godounov' was produced at the Paris Grand Opéra. After this opera was performed, M. Calvocoressi was made a Knight of the Russian Imperial Order of Saint Anne. He was one of the founders of the short-lived British Concert Society in Paris, and he gave lectures in connection with the Society. He believes he was the first to write in French an article on Elgar (Revue Musicale, 1905). He visited the London Musical Congress in 1911, as delegate from Greece, when he was the chairman of the third section (Æsthetics and Theory). That was the first occasion on which he addressed an English audience. Since that time he has lectured at the Musicians' Holiday meeting at Bideford, his subjects being Russian and French music and Franz Liszt. He has just completed the delivery of four lectures on French music before the University extension summer meeting at Oxford, which we summarise below, and he will be lecturing again at the Musicians' Holiday, Port Ballintrae, Ireland, on 'Greek Folk-song' and 'Musical geography of modern Europe.'

OXFORD LECTURES ON FRENCH MUSIC.

If we are to look at all for national characteristics in French music, to admit that 'French music' means something more than 'music in France,' we should begin by acknowledging that national character in music depends upon anything rather than upon the use of folk-tunes. What we call national character is, in Mr. Cecil Sharp's words, 'an abstraction, a deduction, the greatest common measure of a large number of more or less dissimilar units.'

Roughly speaking, French national character is best defined by adducing the French taste for measure, common-sense, matter-of-fact ends, rationality rather than imaginativeness, their dislike for vagueness and revery. The consequences of that idiosyncrasy are many and various, but in every case do we find it as 'the greatest common measure.' In plain-song—the origin, with folk-song, of French art-music—we find almost stereotyped motives, groups of neumes recurring to which a conventional meaning is attached. Abstractedness, but coupled with strictly dialectic methods implying a great deal of sheer brainwork, prevails in the achievements of the old contrapuntists, to disappear with the advent of the Renaissance, when accurate expression and description became the order of the day. Jannquin's works, in both respects, are of paramount significance.

Despite the efforts of composers like Titelouze (1563-1633), a great precursor of fugue-writing, of Chambonnières (1610-1671), Le Bègue (1630-1702), and others, to Rameau, pure abstract instrumental music, except the actual suite, progresses little in France: the fugue, later the sonata, and other high forms flourish elsewhere and almost reach the stage of stereotyped academical formalism before the French school shows any actual concern in them. The first in date of sonatas and symphonies, &c., deserving consideration to be produced by the French school are those of Saint-Saëns, Castillon, Lalo, César Franck.

Poetic, descriptive music is preferred, and we find pregnant specimens of it in the output of Couperin (1668-1733), Rameau (1683-1764), and others.

It is in the name of common-sense that Boileau, St. Evremond, and a large fraction of the public object to opera, that others assert the necessity of music remaining in the opera as strictly subordinate as possible to the text. Lulli (1633-1687) achieved success by keeping this rule in view. Rameau, who gave greater place to music, was frequently abused as a 'distiller of extravagant chords,' a writer of 'chaotic' or 'merely mechanical' music. He was too much of a musician for his public. In other times, and in other surroundings, he would have certainly been prompted by his musicianship and his marvellous insight to higher achievements.

Another great musician of the 17th century, whom circumstances (and also Lulli's steady opposition) prevented from coming to his own, was Marc-Antoine Charpentier (1634-1702).

After Rameau comes the decadence. Music is judged no longer as music, but from the merely literary point of view. Common-sense run mad prompts Rousseau, Diderot, and others to despise all but the crudest, most puerile forms of music, music that 'imitates nature' and owes nothing to technique. Through over-confidence in the infallibility of their tastes, through not being sustained by any high ideality (indeed even the spirit of the Louis XIV. era had been most narrow and conventional, and unfavourable to the progress of music), the French allow their formerly fine sense of rationality to sink into a shallow, self-satisfied routine. Even composers like Grétry, who was in many respects a true artist, cannot, for lack of culture, rise very high.

A classical tradition as regards opera is maintained to a degree by composers like Spontini (1774-1851), and especially Méhul (1763-1817), a remarkable forerunner of romanticism, but the taste of the public is gradually sinking to the low level for which Adolphe Adam, Halévy, Meyerbeer, and, later, Ambroise Thomas will cater.

Berlioz (1803-69), the great romantic composer, carries to the utmost the ideals of his master, Lesueur (1760-1837), asserting the rights of music that 'imitates and specifies, expresses and depicts.' His sense of music as an independent art is, as Wagner has shown it, practically nil. He is to be remembered more for the paths he opened than for what he actually achieved; he greatly helped to do away with obsolete conventions, but substituted in their place little that is enduring.

In the meanwhile, culture had prospered among the élite of the French music-lovers. Habeneck had introduced Beethoven's symphonies, interest grew in classical works. But despite the advent of earnestly-minded and gifted composers like Gounod (1818-93), Lalo (1823-92), Saint-Saëns (b. 1835), something would have missed to further the progress of the musical and of the general public, but for the revelation of Wagner's works and of his theories.

Indeed, the influence of Wagner, his part in the movement that ended in a modern Renaissance of music in France, a Renaissance by virtue of which France has given birth to one of the leading schools of the world, is capital. He has greatly contributed to teach the French to take musical art in earnest, to interest them in the higher ideals and in the philosophy of music. His influence, however, became excessive, and would have done much harm but for the violent reaction that ensued.

Nowadays France has several distinct schools. Apart from the more conservatively-minded French composers and those who, like Massenet or Charpentier, seek success by the shortest and easiest ways, the principal of these is that of César Franck (1822-90), whose leader is Vincent d'Indy (b. 1855). Its members evince a fondness for elaborate abstract forms, in the handling of which they display remarkably efficient, highly rational methods. Then there is the 'impressionist' school—a most inadequate term, for it seems to imply that materially descriptive music, or music founded on material suggestion, is the school's sole or chief aim. In the new types of pure music produced by 'impressionist' composers (like Debussy's Quartet, or Ravel's, &c.) we can see how independent of material impressions their music really is; and also that by its novel, subtly conveyed, innermost affinities it gives the mind satisfactions of a less hackneyed order than if founded on pre-established formal relationships. A whole group of progressive, earnest composers belong to a rather extreme school. Their head is M. Gabriel Fauré (b. 1845), in whose works an even balance is struck between classical tendencies and modernism. The same may be said of M. Florent Schmitt (b. 1870), 'one of the greatest composers of his generation,' and of MM. Louis Aubert (b. 1873) and Albert Roussel (b. 1869).

The early works of M. Alfred Bruneau (b. 1857) have exercised a great influence on the modern French school, and those of Emmanuel Chabrier (1841-94) an even greater.

Among song-writers M. Henri Duparc (b. 1833) and M. Pierre de Bréville (b. 1858) deserve special mention.

[The lectures were plentifully illustrated on the pianoforte by Miss Ethel Hamlyn, who displayed excellent musicianship and understanding in her interpretations of clavichord pieces by Couperin, Dandrieu, and Rameau, pianoforte works of César Franck, Vincent d'Indy, Chabrier, Debussy, Florent Schmitt, Deodat de Séverac, Erik Satie, Ravel; by Miss Marjorie Thompson, whose full, well-controlled mezzo, and excellent French pronunciation won golden opinions, her share in the programme consisting of troubadour songs, airs by Lulli, Rameau, Rousseau, Grétry; modern songs by Lalo, Franck, Délibes, Fauré, Debussy; and by Mr. Montagu Nathan, who played admirably violin pieces by old masters; J. M. le Clerc, Jacques Aubert, Francœur, Gossec, and Grétry.

Several of the points touched by the lecturer were studied at length in his contributions to the Musical Times,* and are therefore not included in this synopsis.]

FALSTAFF.

BY EDWARD ELGAR.

For the Leeds Festival, in October, a 'Symphonic study for orchestra, in C minor, with two Interludes in A minor' (Op. 68), has been completed by the writer of these notes. If we take the word 'study' in its literary use and meaning, the composer's intention will be sufficiently indicated.

As the work is based solely on the Falstaff of the historical plays (1 & 2 Henry IV. and Henry V.), in examining it or listening to it, the caricature in The Merry Wives of Windsor, which, unluckily, is better known to English playgoers than the real Falstaff, must be forgotten. Prof. Dowden, after allowing the probable authenticity of the tradition that The Merry Wives was written at the request of Elizabeth, says: 'Shakspeare dressed up a fat rogue, brought forward for the occasion from the back premises of the poet's imagination, in Falstaff's clothes, . . . he made it impossible for the most laborious 19th century critic to patch on The Merry Wives to Henry IV.*, and it is noteworthy that Morgann, in his essay on Falstaff, ignores The Merry Wives entirely. The real 'Sir John Falstaff is a conception hardly less complex, hardly less wonderful than that of Hamlet.† This complexity has been summed up by Morgann as follows: 'He is a character made up by Shakespeare wholly of incongruities;—a man at once young and old, enterprising and fat, a dupe and a wit, harmless and wicked, weak in principle and resolute by constitution, cowardly in appearance and brave in reality; a knave without malice, a liar without deceit; and a knight, a gentleman and a soldier, without either dignity, decency, or honour.'‡

The idea that Falstaff is merely a farcical character is entertained so generally that it is necessary to insist on the last clause of Morgann's statement—a knight, a gentleman, and a soldier. He 'is by no means a purely comic character. Were he no more than this, the stern words of Henry to his old companion would be unendurable.'* 'He had been page to the Duke of Norfolk, a fact which certifies to his respectability of position and inferentially to his possessing the instincts of a gentleman; had associated with John of Gaunt, who certainly would have had nothing to do with a poltroon; had served for many years in the army and earned knighthood, then a purely military title . . . takes his soldiers into the thick of the fight where they are soundly peppered, and he himself must have been in great danger, earns from the Prince who supposed him to be dead, a tribute of regret he would hardly have bestowed on one whose cowardice he despised.'†

To this catalogue of honour may be added that Falstaff appears at the Council held in the King's camp (1 Henry IV., Act v., Scene 1), the others present being the King, the Prince, Lord John of Lancaster, and the Earl of Westmoreland.

It is in 'an apartment of the Prince's' that Falstaff first appears, and the feeling of pleasantry which runs through the dialogue is almost courtly; Prince Henry apostrophises him as 'Thou latter spring! All-hallow'n summer!' Then follow scenes so finely graduated that they exhibit one of the highest flights of Shakespeare's genius—we are shown the inevitable degradation down to the squalid end.

'In the First part (Hen. IV.) he takes a whole-hearted delight in himself, in his jollifications, his drolleries, his exploits on the highway and his almost purposeless mendacity. . . . In the Second part his wit becomes coarser, his conduct more indefensible, his cynicism less genial.‡ He appears many times in the Second part, but only on one occasion in the Prince's company; we note almost with pain, the gradual fall from the close companionship to lower and still lower levels until we arrive at the repudiation by the new King followed by the death scene, the peculiarly poignant account of which is given in Henry V. 'The king has killed his heart,' says the Hostess—'The king hath run bad humours on the knight,' says Nym—'His heart is fractured and corroborate,' says magniloquent Pistol, and in the next Act comes the incomparable passage 'A' made a finer end and went away an it had been any christom child; . . . for after I saw him fumble with the sheets and play with flowers and smile upon his fingers' ends, I knew there was but one way; for his nose was as sharp as a pen, and a' babbled of green fields.'§

Hazlitt sums up his study of Falstaff thus: 'The true spirit of humanity, the thorough knowledge of the stuff we are made of, the practical wisdom with the seeming fooleries, have no parallel anywhere else. . . . In one point of view they are laughable in the extreme, in another they are equally affecting—if it is affecting to shew what a little thing is human life.'

§ I have adopted Theobald's suggestion, now beyond cavil if not beyond criticism.

The musical interpretation, or, as it is preferably called study of the character of Falstaff, is practically in one movement, with two interludes, to be noted later, and falls naturally into four principal divisions which run on without break. These divisions are not shown in the score, but it is convenient to cite them as follows:

- I. Falstaff and Prince Henry;
- II. Eastcheap, — Gadshill, — The Boar's Head, revelry and sleep;
- III. Falstaff's March,—The return through Gloucestershire,—The new King,—The hurried ride to London;
- IV. King Henry V.'s progress,—The repudiation of Falstaff, and his death.

Some lines quoted from the plays are occasionally placed under the themes to indicate the feeling to be conveyed by the music; but it is not intended that the meaning of the music, often varied and intensified, shall be narrowed to a corollary of these quotations only, and this simple presentation of the composer's ideas makes no attempt to describe the manifold combinations of the themes, the contrapuntal devices, and other complexities of the score.

1. (G7)

2. ten. &c. glissando.

'Sweet wag, when thou art king,' &c.

The gargantuan, wide-compassed fortissimo (Ex. 4), first given to the strings in three octaves, exhibits his boastfulness and colossal mendacity:

EX. 4. Grandioso e largamente.

'I am a rogue if I were not at half sword with a dozen of them two hours together.'

The Prince is suggested in his most courtly and genial mood by:

EX. 5. Celli, &c.

The symbol of his stern, military character will be found later (Ex. 21).

As the scene is mainly a conversation the music consists of a presentation and variation of these themes, ending with an impetuous rush of Ex. 1,—the persuasive Falstaff has triumphed, the dominating Sir John is in the ascendant.

II.

We are in Eastcheap and plunge into a quicker tempo commencing with a theme made up of short, brisk phrases:

EX. 6. Cl. & Fag. Viols. p

Celli. tr. tr.

all of which, used largely in the construction, should chatter, blaze, glitter and coruscate; no particular incident is depicted, but the whole passage was suggested by the following paragraph:

'From the coldness, the caution, the conversation of his father's court, Prince Henry escapes to the teeming vitality of the London streets and the Tavern where Falstaff is monarch. There, among ostlers and carriers, and drawers, and merchants, and pilgrims, and loud robustious women, he at least has freedom and frolic.' *

The musical illustration of the Tavern would not be complete without the Hostess and Doll Tearsheet, if not the 'dozen or fourteen honest gentlewomen,' so a suggestion of the theme associated with this most virtuous company flits across the fabric to find its full expression later.

We now come to more substantial material:

Here with his cheery companions is the Falstaff who sings, 'When Arthur first in court,' who shouts delightedly at the prospect of battle, 'Rare words! brave world!' and who describes himself as 'a goodly, portly man, of a cheerful look, a pleasing eye, and a most noble carriage,' and who 'did good service at Shrewsbury.'

A full presentation of Ex. 4 follows, and a vociferous combination for full orchestra of Exx. 8 and 4, the latter forming the bass; after a short recapitulation of Ex. 6 and its companions (diminuendo), we enter on a new phase, the midnight exploit at Gadshill. Want of space prevents the exhibition of the material employed, save the cheerful, out-of-door, ambling theme:

and the mysterious semiquaver passages with the muffled calls through the wood:

Variants of Ex. 5 in hurried quavers pianissimo are heard, indicating the coming of the Prince, and the strenuous Ex. 12:

depicts the short struggle for the twice-stolen booty, 'got with much ease.'

An extended fugato on Ex. 4 in quavers, hurried and scrambling, suggests the discomfiture of the thieves, who, after some attempts to repair their disorder (Exx. 8 and 9) arrive once more in tolerable case at the Boar's Head:

'Shall we be merry? As merry as crickets.'

The 'honest gentlewomen's' theme (Ex. 13), now complete and raised to due importance, runs its scherzo-like course until the Falstaff theme (Ex. 4) is interjected, somewhat unsteadily but encouragingly, evolving a trio section of uproarious vitality; after the reprise, the knight again attempts speech (Ex. 4), but is somewhat more incoherent, vague, and somnolent. Through the heavy atmosphere a strange, nightmare variant of the women's theme floats:

C. B. pizz. 8va. lower.

and with an augmented version of Ex. 1 Falstaff sinks down to the heavy sleep suggested by:

'Fast asleep behind the arras;—how hard he fetches breath.'

The sleep theme is embroidered with much orchestral detail for muted strings, &c., and leads into the first interlude:

'He was page to the Duke of Norfolk.'

This, a dream-picture, is scored for a small orchestra; simple in form and somewhat antiquated in mood, it suggests in its strong contrast to the immediately preceding riot, 'what might have been.'

III.

But the man who 'broke Skogan's head' does not long dream of the courtly period of his youth; Exx. 2 and 3, now fortissimo, show a sudden awakening; a fanfare is heard (muted brass):

once distant and a second time less remote. All is bustle and preparation for the route, 'a dozen captains . . . knocking at the taverns and asking everyone for Sir John Falstaff.'

Out of the hurry and confusion Ex. 1 is heard; Falstaff emerges 'to take soldiers up in counties as he goes.' The march follows:

'I have foundered nine score and odd posts.'

It is hoped its attendant theme may be a fitting accompaniment to the martial gait of the scarecrow army, of Wart, Mouldy, and the 'forcible Feeble.'

On the edge of battle, the light-hearted knight, who had once before led his men where they were 'soundly peppered,' jokes in the face of danger with John of Lancaster (Exx. 1 and 6, now in the bass and much extended).

When the army is 'discharged all and gone,' he decides 'I'll through Gloucestershire: there will I visit Master Robert Shallow, esquire.' The march (Exx. 17 and 18), as we approach the fields and apple-trees, assumes a song-like character:

until we rest in Shallow's orchard. Here we have the second interlude, scored as is the first for small orchestra, and again with an old English flavour and as simple in form.

After some sadly-merry pipe and tabor music the following passage for muted violas and 'celli may be quoted, as it plays an important part in section IV.:

This mild, bucolic entertainment is suddenly interrupted by Pistol announcing (Ex. 5), 'Thy tender lambkin now is King—Harry the Fifth's the man.' A large and agitated presentation of Ex. 4 shows Falstaff glorying in the news: 'Master Shallow, my Lord Shallow, be what thou wilt, I am fortune's steward.' The march theme (Ex. 17) is resumed rapidly, 'I know the young King is sick for me'—'we'll ride all night.'

IV.

Near Westminster Abbey the new King is to pass with his train; Falstaff and all his company await his coming among the shouting populace,—'There roar'd the sea, and trumpet-clangor sounds.'

The music takes the form of a triumphal march, founded on the King's military theme (Ex. 21):

with several additional sections. Into them the Falstaff themes are expectantly thrown; the King's approach is suggested (as in section I.) by a strenuous version of Ex. 11, recalling the merry times of Gadshill, but now the orchestration is heavier and the import serious.

The climax comes with Ex. 5, fully harmonized and extended, when the King appears 'Glittering in golden coat . . . and gorgeous as the sun at midsummer'; then with a rush of quavers, the Falstaff theme (Ex. 1) is given fortissimo, and the King halts. A brief parley ensues, but Falstaff is inexorably swept aside by the King's brazen motto, and the last pitiful attempt at cajolery is rudely blasted by the furious fanfare (Ex. 16):

'How ill white hairs become a fool and jester—I banish thee on pain of death.'

Immediately the royal march is resumed, and dies away: the King has looked on his ancient friend for the last time.

In short phrases (Exx. 1 and 6) the decay of the merry-hearted one is shown. The broken man weakens until, with a weird, final attempt at humour (Ex. 3—violins), we enter upon the death scene—'He is so shaken that it is most lamentable to behold.' The incomparable description has been quoted already; the music is founded on the orchard theme (Ex. 20). With many changes of harmony, faltering and uncertain, it goes to the end as if 'he played with flowers and babbled of green fields.' True as ever to human life, Shakespeare makes him cry out even at this moment not only of God but of sack, and of women; so the terrible, nightmare version of the women's theme (Ex. 13*a*) darkens (or lightens, who shall say?) the last dim moments. Softly, as intelligence fades, we hear the complete theme of the gracious Prince Hal (Ex. 5), and then the nerveless final struggle and collapse; the brass holds pianissimo a full chord of C major, and Falstaff is dead.

In the distance we hear the veiled sound of a military drum; the King's stern theme is curtly thrown across the picture, the shrill drum roll again asserts itself momentarily, and with one pizzicato chord the work ends; the man of stern reality has triumphed.

In the time of their close friendship the Prince, thinking him dead, says, 'Poor Jack, farewell, I could have spared a better man,' and sadly we say so now. The Prince, arrived at his kingly dignity, fulfilled the prophecy of Warwick, 'he will cast off his followers, and their memory shall a pattern or a measure live.'

Their memory does live, and the marvellous 'pattern and measure' Sir John Falstaff with his companions might well have said, as we may well say now, 'We play fools with the time, and the spirits of the wise sit in the clouds and mock us.'

['Falstaff,' Symphonic-Study with two Interludes (Op. 68), will be performed at the Leeds Musical Festival on Thursday evening, October 2. It will be conducted by Sir Edward Elgar.]

THE NIETZSCHEAN SPIRIT IN MUSIC.

By GERALD CUMBERLAND.

Just as we can see signs of the rising sun long before it has appeared above the horizon, so can we clearly trace the coming of a new philosopher or poet in the work of the men of a previous generation. A great man, it would seem, begins to influence the world before he is born; tidings of him reach us mysteriously, and our need of him seems to have the power of actually bringing him into being. Great men are not born fortuitously; they always arrive at the precise moment when they are required. Moreover, their coming is prepared for; in one place or another some men and women are always made ready for the reception of their ideas. Charles Darwin did not blaze suddenly upon the world of science: the comet, swimming into existence from outer space, had been dimly seen many years before its arrival. In the music of Haydn are the ghostly features of the coming Beethoven, and upon the operas of Gluck we can detect the faint impress of Wagner's hand. Even Nietzsche, the most original of all recent philosophers, was not new; he had, so to speak, appeared in the world many times before, writing in faltering tones with the pen of Stendhal, aiming blows at the world with the puissant arm of Napoleon, and occasionally flouting Europe with the music of Berlioz. The personality of Nietzsche was but a gathering together, a focussing, of many scattered forces which, by some unknown principle of Nature, united themselves together in order to strike more heavily upon the closed doors of intellectual prejudice.

The truth is that all great men present in their genius certain common human qualities in a concentrated form. The essence of many thousands of rose-leaves is distilled into a pint of attar, and into a man of genius have been pressed the unconscious thoughts and aspirations of multitudes of his fellow-men. He merely voices what they feel; when they hear him speaking aloud their own thoughts, they hail him as a prophet and seer. But he is not different from them except in his greater power and courage. When Nietzsche began to be extensively read, a large section of Europe became conscious of something in themselves which they had never seen before; that is to say, the philosopher did not reveal anything new, but simply expressed what was and always has been embedded in human nature. In a word, the Nietzschean spirit is not new—it is old; but for many years it has either been lying dormant, or it never fully revealed itself until Nietzsche himself began to write.

But what precisely is the Nietzschean spirit? Briefly, it is the spirit of the master as opposed to the spirit of the slave; it is the spirit of conquest, of self-confidence, of self-trust, of courage, of cruelty even, of selfishness. Now, these qualities (or defects, if so you choose to call them) have been present in many men of creative musical genius; indeed, no really great composer has been entirely without them; but men like Richard Strauss, Berlioz, and Wagner have possessed them in a conspicuous degree, whilst other writers like Chopin, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Schumann, and Schubert showed little of that sublime spiritual arrogance which is in many cases so symptomatic of creative genius. It may be said of Mendelssohn that he did not conquer the world; rather did the world conquer him. Chopin seduced that part of the world which fell in love with him—Paris. Brahms had so much of the philosophic spirit that he never cared to fight, and the love of conquest meant nothing to him. Schumann and Schubert had the mild, gentle souls of children; their self-confidence was naive and charming; they had nothing of the brutality and ruthlessness of Berlioz, Strauss, and Wagner.

Berlioz was the first among composers to fight the world rather than to entice it. He was, of course, by no means the first to be misunderstood: Bach before him, and many another great mind, had worked on from one decade to another with only scant recognition. Bach, however, had a great spirit; his peace of mind was not lost, nor was his genius warped, by neglect. Calmly he went on with his work, writing music for generations that were to come after him. But Berlioz craved for fame and, being denied it, turned upon himself and rent his own genius, passing from one extravagance to another in a veritable paranoia of arrogance. Nothing breeds eccentricity so surely as failure. If we cannot make the world feel our genius, we will at least make it recognize our existence—that is the point of view of, and the policy adopted by, many young men suffering from a sense of neglect and wounded self-esteem. So felt Berlioz in and about the year 1830 and onwards, when one attempt after another to gain recognition ended in defeat. Most successful men have their vanity, but there is nothing so rank as the vanity of the artist who has failed. His belief in himself is increased by the scepticism of others. That is why the seed of Nietzscheism inherent in Berlioz developed almost to the point of insanity. He lost his communal instincts in worship of himself. His love of large orchestras and gigantic choruses (a love shared by Wagner and Richard Strauss) was but one indication of his passion for the colossal, and (it may be said) but one symptom of the disorder of his brain.

Wagner is another and a more striking case of that kind of egomania which appears to me to be the basis of Nietzsche's philosophy. Until the last few years of his life Wagner must have regarded himself as a failure. He had faith in himself that no adversity could shake, and the event has proved that this faith was amply justified. But his 'blond beast' attitude to his fellows was evinced more by his treatment of his friends and acquaintances than by his trust in his own genius. There is now a great mass of evidence available (no little of it penned by Wagner himself) that proves beyond a shadow of doubt that as regards money he had a particularly easy and accommodating conscience. He borrowed and did not pay back; he got into debt and ran away from his debts; he accepted gifts of cash without any apparent (or, at all events, only a short-lived) gratitude. Whether or not he was justified in doing this is no concern of mine; but I venture to state that his work would have been injured if he had been sensitive about money matters, and that the world has gained in joy and artistic richness a thousand times more than it gained in annoyance or sorrow through Wagner's conduct. To that extent he may escape condemnation for his confusion of thought regarding what belonged to him and what belonged to others. But the point I wish to make is that he was an admirable example of the superman in cash transactions; in this he was, indeed, 'above morality.' But the Nietzschean spirit in him manifested itself in almost everything he did. He was a born conqueror of men. People who came into personal contact with him either worshipped or hated him, and he employed his disciples unmercifully. No man of his generation demanded such ungrudging devotion from his friends, and I believe that in the early years of their friendship most of them worked for him primarily and for art secondarily. He had the visions of the egomaniac, but in his case his dreams came true.

But Richard Strauss provides a much more striking example of the Nietzschean spirit in music than either Wagner or Berlioz. Here is a man who is apparently infatuated with the idea of worldly success; with cold and deliberate calculation he courts the favour of the world by the most elaborate and subtle trickery. He has the genius of self-advertisement. Every work he has written since 'Ein Heldenleben' has contained some colossal piece of artistic impertinence which has aroused the animosity of music-lovers all over the world, and which has secured hundreds of performances of music which otherwise would have been heard only infrequently. The 'Domestic' Symphony had a baby and a bath; 'Electra' had carnage and insanity; 'Salome' contained a lady suffering from psychical disease; 'Rosenkavalier' was decorated with two bedrooms; 'Ariadne' had an orchestra of solo instruments; and so on. There is genius in each of these works, but there is also an equal amount of charlatanism. Musical history contains no other figure who combines in an almost equal degree the virtue of sincerity and the vice of pretence. Now, only a man saturated through and through with a delusion of his supreme importance would willingly stultify his own genius as Strauss has done for many years. A man may have the utmost faith in his genius and remain sane; but when a composer believes his personality to be so overwhelmingly great that he can afford to maim and destroy the genius that is in him, he is on the borderland of artistic insanity. Strauss wishes to conquer the material world; he is out for money. Wagner loved money, but he had a greater regard for his own genius than he had for all the wealth of Christendom.

It would seem, then, that the Nietzschean spirit in Strauss has become inverted. It no longer strives for spiritual power, but for material. As a result he is the most prominent artistic figure in Europe. But in the year 1950 his music perhaps will be played only in Chicago and New York . . . and this terrible calamity must overtake all those who disregard the claims of the spirit and win a temporary success by twisting their genius to grotesque and gargoyle-like shapes.

EDWARD TAYLOR'S GRESHAM LECTURES.

By W. BARCLAY SQUIRE.

Edward Taylor, who from 1837 to 1863 was Professor of Music at Gresham College, was the son of John Taylor, the hymn-writer, of Norwich, and the great-grandson of John Taylor, the Hebraist dissenting minister. He was a brother of Philip Taylor, the civil engineer, and a cousin of Meadows Taylor, the Indian novelist, and of Edward Rigby, the physician. Born at Norwich in 1784, he began life as an ironmonger, and after acting as sheriff at Norwich in 1819, joined his brother Philip and his cousin John Martineau as a civil engineer in London. He possessed a fine bass voice, and from his boyhood had been prominent as a musical amateur, though he did not adopt music as a profession until 1826, when he immediately became a successful bass singer. He conducted the Norwich Festivals of 1827, 1839, and 1842, and was on terms of intimacy with Spohr, whose oratorios he translated and was largely instrumental in making popular in England. In 1837, on the death of R. J. S. Stevens, he was elected Gresham Professor of Music, a post he occupied until his death in 1863. His lectures (to quote Husk's article in Grove's Dictionary) 'were admirably adapted to the understanding of a general audience; they were historical and critical, excellently written, eloquently read, and illustrated by well-chosen extracts from the works described, efficiently performed.' They were repeated in various provincial towns, and a lecture on madrigals, delivered at Bristol in 1837, led to the foundation of the Bristol Madrigal Society. The manuscripts of a number of them (with the accompanying illustrations) are preserved in the library of the Royal College of Music, where it is to be feared that they have not been looked at for many years. A recent careful examination for the purpose of the new catalogue of the College's manuscripts shows that the description of them in Husk's 'Catalogue of the Sacred Harmonic Library' (with which they have passed into the possession of the Royal College) is not quite accurate. Hardly any of the sets described by Husk are complete, and it is evident that, in the course of his long career as a lecturer, Taylor re-wrote early lectures and incorporated them in later series. Those dealing with the earlier history of music are out-of-date in the matter of research, and the musical illustrations are constantly vitiated by the fatal habit of arranging and interpolating additions of Taylor's own, which was the accepted idea of 'editing' in the early Victorian era. But among the mass of valueless matter, the series of lectures dealing with English dramatic music at the end of the 18th and beginning of the 19th centuries contains many interesting details drawn from the lecturer's personal recollection. In his inaugural lectures (delivered in 1838 and printed the same year) Taylor says: 'My own recollection embraces the commencement of the entire range of instrumental music now in use in our orchestras . . . I remember the birth of Haydn's oratorios and the introduction of Mozart's operas into this country. I have sung in succession with Billington, Dickons, Salmon, Stephens, and Malibran, as well as with Bartleman and Harrison. I have heard the unrivalled vocal excellence of Mara, and seen the extinction of an entire race of dramatic singers (one of whom [evidently referring to Braham] alone survives to delight the present generation with his powers), including Inledon, Kelly, Dignum, and Sedgwick, as well as Storace and Crouch.' The imperfect state in which the lectures have been preserved has unfortunately caused Taylor's reminiscences of some of these singers to be lost, but from what has survived it seemed worth extracting the portions now given to the readers of the Musical Times. They have been taken from various lectures, and some of the redundancies and repetitions in which Taylor largely indulged, have been excised, though care has been taken to note wherever passages have been omitted. It is thought that to future biographers they will be of some value, and though they may not contain many new facts of importance they will be read with interest as the personal recollections of a refined and cultivated, if not a great, musician. It only remains to be added that the extracts are arranged in alphabetical order of subjects, and not in the order in which the lectures from which they are taken were delivered.

THOMAS ATTWOOD.

In 'The Escapes' we have to take leave of Attwood as a composer for the stage. He had terminated his engagement at Drury Lane, and at Covent Garden he only occasionally consented to be employed. He had been appointed Organist of St. Paul's and Composer to the King. He was patronized by the Royal Family, and his time as a teacher of the piano-forte was fully occupied. But he would willingly have devoted some portion of his time (in imitation of his great master, Mozart) to dramatic music, if the intrigues of the Green Room had not given him a distaste to this branch of his profession. These, as he told me, determined him to abandon any permanent connection with the stage.

JONATHAN BATTISHILL.

The history of this accomplished musician reflects little credit on the discernment of his contemporaries. Of all that he produced a few fragments only survive—each so excellent in its kind as to establish his equal command of the varied forms and resources of his art. Battishill essayed many styles of composition and he excelled in all, yet he is generally known as the writer of a solitary anthem and a single glee, while as a dramatic composer he is unknown. Let me endeavour to rescue his name from the partial oblivion into which it has fallen and to claim for it the grateful recollection of his countrymen.

Battishill was born in London in the year 1738. At the age of nine years he was admitted into the choir of St. Paul's, of which his fine voice and quick musical apprehension soon rendered him a distinguished ornament. He was afterwards articled to Mr. Savage, then Master of the Boys in that Cathedral, from whom he received little either of indulgence or instruction. His musical education was neglected, while he was treated rather as a household drudge than as the student of a liberal art. Nevertheless he continued to amass knowledge and to improve in skill as a player. He loved his art with passionate devotion, he pursued it with undeviating constancy, and long before his pupillage had expired, his talents had attracted the attention of all who came within the sphere of their exertion.

When he became his own master, his application, more intense than ever, produced, in connection with such natural powers, its certain fruit, and soon procured him additional celebrity. His ardent spirit of research stored his mind with knowledge, and his constant practice on the organ gave him a command of hand adequate to the execution of whatever his fancy suggested. He became one of the best extempore players of his time. In Dr. Boyce he found an admirer, a patron, and a friend. Battishill became his assistant at the Chapel Royal, where, if merit had anything to do with preferment, he ought to have risen to the highest musical station, but want of interest in the proper quarter condemned him to the lowest. About the same time Battishill found an engagement with the Manager of Covent Garden Theatre, where for some years he presided at the harpsichord. He was afterwards chosen organist of St. Clement, Eastcheap, and St. Martin Orgar, as well as of Christ Church, Newgate Street. In 1764 Battishill essayed the production of an opera, but under the most unpropitious circumstances. His first mistake was a connection with Drury Lane Theatre, where his art was despised, instead of Covent Garden, where it was cherished and appreciated. Garrick was at this time in Italy, and his partner Lacey, finding the tide of public favour fast ebbing from Drury Lane, concluded that his only resource, in Garrick's absence, was to adopt the policy of the rival house and to start a new opera of his own. 'Lacey' (to use the words of Dibdin) 'knowing no difference between one tune and another, imagined that if one man could write a good opera, he had only to employ two to ensure one twice as good, and therefore set Battishill, and Michael Arne to work.' Battishill's second error was one which many a composer, before and since, has committed—the employment of time and talent on a worthless drama. 'Almena,' for this was the title of the opera, was planned and partly written by Dr. Kenrick, and then patched, pieced, and completed by a person named Rolt. When the piece came to be represented, it exhibited such a mass of incoherent insipidity that no musical mint would have sufficed to buoy it up. 'Almena' struggled under its cumbrous load, then sank and disappeared for ever. A portion of it only was published, and according to the testimony of a competent judge, its finest parts must be numbered among its author's lost compositions. It certainly deserved a better fate. . . . But with 'Almena,' Battishill's dramatic career began and ended. . . . It was his fate to peril all his reputation in this branch of his art upon an unsuccessful adventure. . . . Battishill's early life was a series of disappointed hopes and baffled exertions. . . . On the death of Mr. Jones (the organist of St. Paul's Cathedral), his early connection with its choir, his great talents as a performer, and the evidence he had given of his genius as a church composer, seemed to point Battishill out as the fit and worthy successor of Greene and Boyce. Here, again, he failed. In 1777 he lost his wife, a highly accomplished and admirable woman. Under these repeated disappointments and trials his spirit sank and his habits changed. The former had been ardent and buoyant, the latter domestic and exemplary. He was fond of letters, possessed a large and well-chosen library, and was accustomed to seek relaxation from the drudgery of a professional life in pursuits which contributed to refine his character and fertilize his mind. The later years of his life presented a melancholy contrast. Habits of intemperance crept upon him, and at length rendered him their victim. Broken in spirit, debilitated in constitution, shattered and degraded, the wreck of Jonathan Battishill would be found among the haunts of vulgar brutality. Yet the love of his art never wholly forsook him; the flame, though dimmed, was obscured only by death, and occasionally gleamed with all its early brightness.

That beautiful anthem ['Call to Remembrance'] which I have already mentioned, is said, on sufficient authority, to have been written in an obscure ale-house near Smithfield. Battishill died at Islington in the year 1801. His last request was 'Lay me near my dearest friend, Dr. Boyce.' His wish was granted, and in the Cathedral which witnessed the first dawn of his genius his remains are deposited.

JOHN BANNISTER.

He began his career, as several of our favourites in comedy commenced it, by attempting tragedy. He appeared at Drury Lane in 1778 as Zaphna in a translation of Voltaire's tragedy of 'Mahomet'; afterwards as Achmet in 'Barbarossa,' Dorilas in 'Merope,' and other feeble and bombastic translations or imitations of French tragedies. Those who, like myself, only carry their recollections of Jack Bannister to the close of the last century, can scarcely conceive of his being shrouded under 'the pall of gorgeous tragedy,' or that a face beaming with mirth, good humour, and drollery could ever put on the semblance of revenge, hatred, or despair. And it is the more difficult to conceive this, since Bannister on the stage could scarcely be called an actor. His honest, open, animated countenance Nature never intended to be allied to a heart ungenerous, sordid, or selfish. If ever he failed as an actor it was when such a character was thrust upon him. Such was the case when he was condemned to be the original Inkle in 'Inkle and Yarico,' a character of the basest and most loathsome kind, in which his speaking eye could never emit a gleam of benevolence, in which his countenance could never brighten with the glow of kindness, and in which every generous and noble impulse is stifled by the love of self. Here Bannister could not succeed, and he was soon glad to exchange his part for the more congenial one of Trudge. Those who remember his Walter in the 'Children in the Wood' will hardly ever recall it to their memory without a tear; those who knew him would feel that the man, under similar circumstances, would have enacted the same intrepid and generous part that the actor performed on the stage. Seldom has any actor been, or been more deservedly, such a favourite with the public. The excellence of his character in every relation of life, as son, husband, father, and friend, the constancy of his attachments, the undeviating rectitude of his conduct, the absence of all professional jealousy, added to the vivacity of his temper, the charm of his conversation, the sparkle of his wit, and the glow of good humour which he diffused wherever he went, earned for him the affection of his family, the cordial esteem of his brethren, and the attachment of a choice circle of friends. If the stage, like every other profession, has nurtured many who have disgraced it, candour,—nay, justice,—will allow that it has also produced many who have shone not only in the mimic but in real life, and among those all who knew him will reckon Jack Bannister.

JOHN BRAHAM.

Some months before Storace's death he had been sent to Bath by the lessee of Drury Lane Theatre, in order to hear, and, if approved, to engage, a young man who was at that time a resident in that city, being a pupil of Rauzzini. Storace was soon convinced of the extraordinary vocal powers with which nature had gifted him, and which, under such excellent training had even then rendered him the most accomplished singer of his time. I need scarcely add that the person here referred to was my late friend Mr. Braham, who made his first appearance as a tenor singer on the English stage, in Storace's posthumous opera of 'Mahmoud'. . . . I have spoken of Braham as my friend, and such I always found him. Fifty-seven years ago (in 1802) I first stood in the same orchestra with him, but it was not till twenty years afterwards that we were frequently associated. At that time his advice was of great value and his friendship of great service to me. Both were freely and kindly offered, and, I need not add, thankfully received, and I now reflect with pleasure that this friendly intercourse continued, without abatement, to the time of his death. For a long while, during Braham's protracted career, his age was only conjectured. He was the son of humble Jewish parents, and hence no parish register could be appealed to for the date of his birth. He did not know his age till late in life, and used to smile at the announcement of it which sometimes appeared in newspapers and periodicals. 'If what they say is true,' said he to me one day, 'I am considerably past eighty.' The truth is that the generation who witnessed Braham's final efforts were the grandchildren of those who lived at the time of his first appearance. . . . About fifteen years before his death I showed him this very play bill [still preserved in the manuscript of Prof. Taylor's lecture]: 'Royalty Theatre, Well Street, near Goodman's Fields, July 30, 1787,' in which, among other entertainments, is announced the duet 'Time has not thinned my flowing hair,' to be sung by Mr. Arrowsmith and Master Braham. On my putting the question 'Were you the Master Braham here mentioned?' he promptly replied in the affirmative, adding 'I remember singing that duet with Arrowsmith as well as if it were only a week ago.' A short time after, Braham enabled me to fix the year of his birth more exactly. I had occasion to request from him some information respecting Leoni, once a popular singer at Covent Garden Theatre. He furnished me with all the particulars I wanted, and added, unasked, the following information as to his own history: 'In 1786, or thereabout, Leoni married a relation of mine, and became my instructor; John Palmer having heard me sing, in my boy's voice, the ballad 'Hush every breeze,' composed by Theodore Hook's father, James Hook, I was engaged and made my first appearance, as Master Braham, in the character of Cupid, at the Royalty Theatre in the year 1787. I was then ten years old. Leoni's acquirements in the science of music were but moderate, and it ended that the pupil was troublesome to the master.' This document, therefore, settles the disputed question of Braham's age. He was born in 1777, sang first in public in 1787, and died in February, 1856. When Leoni left England for Jamaica, where he died, Braham was a second time left without any natural protector, but his abilities and good conduct procured him the friendship of the Goldschmidts, a family of well-known opulence and respectability, and under their patronage he became a teacher of the pianoforte. In the course of a few years his voice settled into a tenor of extraordinary compass, to the cultivation of which he assiduously applied himself. At this time he was accidentally heard by Mr. Ashe, the eminent flute-player of the day, who recommended him to place himself under the tuition of Rauzzini, who was then, as I have said, a resident at Bath. . . . and employed as a teacher of singing. Of his kindness as a friend, and his ability as an instructor, Braham always spoke in terms of the warmest gratitude. He resided gratuitously in Rauzzini's house for three years, and the same liberality was displayed in the constant and almost paternal anxiety with which Rauzzini cultivated the talents of his young pupil, and to his excellent training may be attributed much of Braham's success and reputation.

Notwithstanding the elevation Braham attained [at the period of his appearance in Stora's 'Mahmoud'], he was conscious that a greater proficiency had yet to be acquired before he could arrive at the position as a musician as well as a singer to which he aspired. He determined, in company with the sister of his late friend Stora, to make the Continent his residence for a considerable time. Their first resting-place was Paris, where, although Braham added nothing to his musical knowledge, he largely replenished his purse. Although originally intending to make but a short stay in the French capital, he was induced to prolong it to eight months, . . . and in the ensuing May he quitted Paris for Italy, amply provided with letters from the French Government to its ambassadors at the various Italian States. His first visit was to Florence, where his reception, in the opera of 'Ulysses,' was most flattering. After his success in the Tuscan capital he proceeded to Milan, and thence to Genoa, where he performed in the opera of 'Lodoiska' with Marchesi, who had then attained the reputation of being the most accomplished tenor singer in Italy, and his success was so great that the opera was repeated thirty successive nights. During Braham's stay at Genoa he applied himself diligently to the study of composition under Isola, an eminent Italian musician who then resided in that city. From thence he went to Leghorn, where he received a hearty welcome from his countryman, Lord Nelson. He afterwards visited Naples and Venice, where the applause he met with kept pace with his high deserts, but the disturbed state of the Continent determined him at once to return to England. From Trieste he travelled to Hamburg, whence he sailed for his native country. His increasing reputation on the Continent had reached England, and had procured him various solicitations for his return. Among them were offers from Mr. Harris, then proprietor of Covent Garden, which he did not hesitate to accept. He arrived early in the winter of 1811, and soon after Christmas he appeared in a new opera written by Prince Hoare, under the title of 'Chains of the Heart,' the music of which was composed by Mazzinghi and Reeve. Braham was here made to feel the loss of his friend and coadjutor Stora, for Mazzinghi was far inferior to him as a composer, and, in fact, though able sometimes to hit off a pleasing melody, he was destitute of the ability to construct an opera. Whether from ignorance of our language or from mere carelessness, he often converted the words he undertook to set into sheer nonsense. The opera failed of its expected attraction, and no wonder when, in addition to this defect, it had to contend with the recollection of the far superior music of Stora.

Braham, no doubt, had been well informed of the want of musical talent at both the London theatres and of the opening there was for employment in that direction. While cultivating the study of harmony under Isola at Genoa it was with a view to occupy a position which now might be said to be almost vacant. . . . It was therefore natural enough that Braham should have proceeded to carry into effect the design he had entertained, and to make trial of his talents as a composer for the stage. . . . Accordingly we find him engaged in the composition of an opera with Mazzinghi and Reeve, the words of which were furnished by Tom Dibdin, the title being 'Family Quarrels.' Braham was now brought into collision with Incledon, who for so many years had filled the place of principal tenor at Covent Garden Theatre, who had occupied that position in all Mr. Shield's operas, and had made many of that eminent composer's songs known and admired all over the kingdom. They were therefore both holding a similar station on the same stage, which was certain to be the cause of envy and jealousy. This would have been the result under any circumstances, but it was increased by Incledon's strong prejudices. Braham's Jewish origin, his Italian training, even his stature, were subjects for Incledon's contemptuous sneers. Each of them was a tenor singer, but the comparison can be carried little further. Nature had endowed each with a voice of great power, rich tone, and extensive compass, but their training, as well as their taste, was wholly different. We have seen that Braham, from being the pupil of Rauzzini, was enabled to sustain, with uniform success, the position of first tenor at the principal Italian theatres and successfully to contend with Marchesi, then the most popular singer in Italy. He had studied, not only the cultivation of his voice, but the art of composition; he was a skilful performer on the pianoforte, and was, in one word, not only a singer but a musician. Incledon could scarcely be said to have had any musical training. He was unable to learn a song without assistance, but Nature had added to a splendid voice a quick and correct ear, a retentive memory, and strong feeling. For Braham Art had done much; for Incledon nothing. In confirmation of my own estimate of Incledon's excellence in his own peculiar style I will give the opinions of two very competent judges. They were both given in my presence, and they are worth recording. It was the custom of the elder Mr. Broadwood to assemble some friends round his hospitable board in Great Pulteney Street every Saturday, and among his most frequent guests was Mr. Shield. At one of these parties I was present and the conversation, after dinner, turned on the respective merits of Braham and Incledon as singers. Braham was then in the height of his popularity, and it was the fashion with a certain musical set to extol him at Incledon's expense. 'Well,' said Mr. Broadwood, addressing himself to Shield, 'give us your opinion.' I well remember the reply of that amiable man and excellent musician. 'Perhaps,' said he, 'this is a point on which I may claim some right to speak. I believe that I have written more for Charles Incledon than any man living, and I can truly say that he has not only done justice to my songs but that he has added to them feeling and expression, for which the public gave me credit, but which really belonged to the singer.' The other opinion was that of Mr. Braham himself. The principal singers at a provincial festival were conversing in the Green Room, when one of them (whose name I need not mention, but who had formed a high estimate of his own powers) thought fit to assert that Incedon was a coarse, vulgar singer. At that moment Braham entered the room, and I at once appealed to him on the point. His answer was that 'in his own peculiar style Incedon was unrivalled, and that there were certain songs in which no singer could successfully contend with him.' Such opinions as these are worthy of being recorded, since they enable us to form an accurate estimate of the power of a singer who was so long and so largely connected with the subject now before us.

It will be right to take some notice of the position which Braham now [in 1803] occupied in the musical world, which was more extensive and commanding than that of any other singer. The rest of his contemporaries had their several allotted spheres, to one the stage, to another the concert room; one excelled in ancient music, another in modern, while the singers in Italian opera formed a class by themselves. But in Braham each class found a formidable rival. His birth and early English education, his subsequent Italian training, his acquaintance with the business of the stage, his familiarity with foreign languages, his knowledge of music, and his unceasing desire for improvement, added to his splendid voice and unrivalled execution, enabled him to assume the first rank in all these different departments of his art, although in each of them he had to contend with a formidable competitor. Into one of them he found it impossible to obtain an entrance during the entire period in which his voice was in its prime. The Concerts of Antient Music, at that time, were patronized by George III., and the Directors were noblemen; hence they were the resort of the aristocracy, and happy were such of their toadies or hangers-on as had sufficient interest to obtain the envied distinction of being subscribers, while to be chosen as one of the principal singers was a sure passport to engagements of all kinds. . . . The Directors, as I have said, though nominally noblemen, were really directed by others. And at that time the controlling power was exercised by Harrison, Bartleman, and Greatorex—a firm, compacted, and powerful combination, whose object it was to exclude all such singers from these concerts as refused submission to their will, or declined to take whatever subordinate position might be allotted to them. It was during their dictatorship that an interview took place which I shall relate, as nearly as I can recollect, in the words employed by Mr. Braham when he related it to me: 'Having returned' (said he) 'from Italy with some reputation, and been received with some favour at home, the Directors of the Antient Concerts saw fit to negotiate with me for an engagement. I was accordingly summoned to their presence, where, in addition to themselves, I found their adviser, Mr. Greatorex. They expressed a wish that I should sing at the next concert, and requested me to name my song. Knowing that Harrison had never sung the scene from "Jephtha," and not wishing to interfere with him, I proposed the recitative and air, "Deeper and deeper still," which I had not then sung in public. I was at once told that this could not be allowed. I then asked what it was proposed I should sing, and when I heard that it was some inferior composition, from which no singer could gain any credit, I asked whether this was the condition of my singing at the Antient Concerts, and being answered in the affirmative, I took up my hat and said: "My Lords and Gentlemen,—It only remains for me to wish you a good morning." The result was that thirty years elapsed before Braham made his appearance in the orchestra of the Antient Concerts, where he sang the scene from "Jephtha" in which he had originally proposed to make his appearance. He was received with a degree of applause not usually given by his aristocratic hearers. On his return to Covent Garden, where we were both engaged the same night, he told me of his reception, adding: "They have lost the best of me; I am not what I was thirty years ago." In consequence of this refusal to admit Braham into the orchestra of the Antient Concerts, the only opportunity which remained to him in the metropolis of displaying his knowledge of Handel's compositions was in what were called the Lent Oratorios, which were performances of music in Covent Garden Theatre, sacred and secular, jumbled together 'in most admired disorder' by the Messrs. Ashley, into whose hands the management of them had fallen. But these sufficed to exhibit the versatility of Braham's vocal powers, and to show that he was not a mere singer of stage ballads and bravuras, but one who had successfully studied in the classical school of Handel. He was, therefore, soon engaged at most of the provincial Festivals. The first song I ever heard Braham sing was 'Gentle Airs,' from Handel's 'Athaliah,' and nothing could exceed the purity of tone and chasteness of style that marked his execution of it. He differed, sometimes, from his eminent contemporaries in his conception and delivery of some of Handel's songs, but it was always evident that he had diligently studied his author, and endeavoured to give his compositions the most correct and eloquent expression. I adduce only a single example, Samson's lamentation for his blindness, 'Total eclipse.' Here was no room for the display of vocal agility, since this air is simply the expression of music added to the eloquence of poetry. Braham felt this. He neither added a grace nor altered a note of the song, but I have never heard a singer who could equal him in the delivery of this impassioned appeal. . . . [As a composer] Braham . . . rarely made any attempt to employ the resources of harmony in his compositions. His modulations were always of the simplest kind, as if he were afraid of wandering more than a single step from his original key. He never ventured on the composition of a glee, properly so-called, and very rarely sang in one. The concerted pieces which he wrote for the stage are little more than melodies agreeably harmonized, and a succession of common chords. . . . The most popular composition [from his opera 'The English Fleet in 1342'] was the duet 'All's well.' Braham found some difficulty in the construction of this duet, since it was to be sung by himself and Incedon, neither of whom would acknowledge the superiority of the other. No preference, therefore, or prominence was to be given to either. Braham, however, acquitted himself with equal fairness and cleverness. Both singers were satisfied, for each justly claimed his share of the applause with which the duet was always received.

Occasional Notes.

The next, or fifth, Congress of the International Musical Society will take place in Paris from June 1 to 8, 1914. This is Whitsuntide, our Bank Holiday falling on June 1. It will be remembered that the last Congress took place in London from May 29 to June 3, 1911, and that we fully reported the proceedings in our issue for July, 1911. At Paris the scientific part of the Congress will be confined within the period June 2–6, leaving a day for preliminaries, and two days at the end for entertainments and excursions. The programme of music to be performed has not yet been definitely settled. All communications should be addressed 'The Secretary, 1914 Musical Congress, 29 rue La Boétie, Paris.'

The Quarterly Magazine of the International Musical Society (Internationale Musikgesellschaft), July–September, 1913, contains an informing and very interesting article on 'Italian Opera in the 18th century, and its influence on the music of the Classical Period,' by Edward J. Dent. The following are the opening paragraphs:

There are few episodes in the history of music which have been treated with such scornful neglect as has been meted out to that period of Italian opera which began with Alessandro Scarlatti and ended, according to most historians, with the reforms of Gluck. The 'Oxford History of Music,' in spite of the fact that it consecrates two of its six volumes to the 18th century, leaves it almost unmentioned. Impartiality is generally supposed to be one of the first qualities which a historian must possess; but it must be remembered that the historian, like the painter or the map-maker, has to represent the world which he sees as he sees it from his particular point of view. Distortion is the inevitable consequence of the laws of perspective, and the historian who sets impartiality before himself as an ideal can only achieve it by viewing his subject, not from one standpoint, but from a circle of points. Whatever point the historian takes, something will have to be foreshortened, something will be left inaccessible to the eye, and the writer who attempts to make the circuit of his subject in this way will probably be censured for both tediousness and inconsistency. The learned authors of the 'Oxford History' are in no way to be blamed because they are not impartial. They made no concealment of the fact that they viewed the 18th century from a standpoint that was exclusively German. It was the standpoint of their generation: Wagner and Brahms once accepted by the leaders of musical thought in this country, it was hardly possible to avoid accepting as a general principle of musical criticism the supposition that whatever was German was good, and whatever was Italian was bad. To that they added the subsidiary principles that as a general rule sacred music was superior to secular and instrumental music to vocal, exception being made only for polyphonic choral writing, solo singing of a strictly declamatory type, and of course German Lieder.

These principles once established, it was only natural that 18th century Italian opera should be regarded as the concentrated expression of all that was most evil in the art of music. The period under review was the period of Bach and Handel. Bach never wrote operas at all; Handel's formed only the least important part of his output, and if lesser men than Handel wrote operas, it was not reasonable to suppose that they should have been any better than his.

As a rule orders to a publisher are very dull reading, but occasionally there is an oasis of humour to relieve the desert of monotony. A letter before us asks for a copy of Wagner's 'O star of eve' with the 'Rest at eve.' We hope it will not be found too fatiguing to our readers to guess what is meant. Probably the error arose from dictation, as it did in 'the few remarks from Chopin' story given in our July issue—the eye and the ear going, as the Irishman remarked, hand in hand. While on the perennial subject of mistakes, it will be appropriate to enshrine here the statement (in the Daily Graphic) that 'the performance of Palestrina's "Mission Papal Marcell" at the Ethical Church, Bayswater, has been made the subject of considerable controversy.' A pity the compositor did not do the job thoroughly by employing the more familiar word, Marsala.

We wonder whether it is of any use to make an appeal to the short-sighted and probably shorter-limbed authorities, whoever they may be, who regulate the seating arrangements of the Queen's Hall stalls and other concert halls where the seats are movable. Some of us who have to go to concerts have been favoured with long legs by a beneficent Providence—one or two well-known critics are especially gifted in this direction. But in the placing of the seats apparently no account whatever is taken even of the average length of lower limbs, and the consequence is that the said limbs have to be painfully contracted and distorted in a humiliating and exasperating struggle to fit the situation. On a recent occasion in the Queen's Hall quite a short-legged sufferer suggested that it appeared to be the understanding (a good word this in the circumstances) that legs were to be left in the cloak room. At twopence apiece this would be expensive, and there might be difficulties afterwards if the cloak room sorting arrangements were not perfect. Is it of any use to appeal to Lancelot of the Referee to help in the matter? He has an eloquent pen, and we are convinced he could write feelingly.

Mr. George Ainslie Hight (Samer, Pas de Calais) writes:

In an article on Wagner in the August number of the Musical Times, Mr. Ernest Newman, referring to the Wesendonck letters, says: 'Few of us could refrain from smiling at his remark about "my purely friendly relations with Mathilde."' Will Mr. Newman kindly explain what he means? I read the letters when they first appeared, and gained the impression of a singularly high-minded and tactful lady who had to do with a somewhat unmanageable and hot-headed but perfectly honourable man. I found nothing to smile at either then or afterwards when I read the autobiography. Perhaps as Mr. Newman's words are likely to create a very wrong impression upon those who are not acquainted with the character of either of the parties, he will be kind enough to say to what he alludes.

We submitted the above letter to Mr. Newman, and he replies as follows:

It gives me infinite pleasure to gratify Mr. Hight's curiosity. The words mean precisely what they say,—no less and no more. Mr. Hight has apparently read into them a suggestion on my part that the relations between Wagner and Mathilde Wesendonck were something more than platonic. I have nowhere suggested that,—not because there is anything in Wagner's character to negate such a supposition, but simply because in the absence of documentary evidence I know nothing about it. I know as little about it, in fact, as Mr. Hight or any other Wagnerian apologist. All I have suggested is that after the glowing expressions of love on his side with which the Wesendonck letters are filled, Wagner's attempt in 'Mein Leben' to make it appear as if the relations between him and Mathilde were merely 'friendly' is enough not merely to make myself and others smile, but to make a cat laugh. The autobiography is, indeed, a most untrustworthy piece of work, as I hope to demonstrate in some detail in my forthcoming book on 'Wagner as Man and Artist.' It tells us just as much as Wagner thought it good for us to know about himself. In his preface he speaks of the 'unadorned veracity' of the book. As a matter of fact, it is anything but veracious at many points,—not that there is any suggestio falsi, but that there is a great deal of suppressio veri. His account of the Wesendonck episode is a case in point. But he was exceedingly reticent about his love affairs all through. He tells us much less about the Cosima affair, for example, than we now know. No one could guess, again, from his references to Friederike Meyer, that she had been his mistress in 1862; or from his references to Mathilde Maier that he had proposed to marry her. And, needless to say, there is no reference in the autobiography to the maid-servant Marie, the 'sweet-heart' to whom he sends 'many kisses' ('viele Küsse meinem Schatz') in the letter announcing his return to Vienna after a lengthy absence in 1863.

Is it not really time these Wagnerian apologists gave up trying to make a saint of the composer, and tried to see him as he really was? I take it that, like the rest of humanity, he was of very mixed clay. The Wagner that is unconsciously revealed to us in the autobiography and the letters is a complex and endlessly interesting character. The impossible and objectionable Wagner is the little tin saint that some people try to make of him. The only pity is that, having set out with the purpose of painting his own portrait, he should not have had the courage to paint himself as he really was. If only he had had the clear-eyed frankness of a Montaigne, a Rousseau, a Cellini, or a Casanova, his autobiography would have been one of the marvels of its kind. He was, as Nietzsche saw, too weak for that. But we who do know what manner of man he was are not to be affected by the average Wagnerite's holding up of the hands in horror at the mere suggestion that occasionally in 'Mein Leben' he suppressed the full facts when he thought they would not square with the legend of himself that he was anxious to establish for all time.

ERNEST NEWMAN.

Mr. Rutland Boughton has written a pamphlet on 'The death and resurrection of the Musical Festival' (William Reeves). He traces the alleged decay of 'Triennials,' the rise of competition Festivals and the need for some reforms, and forecasts the Festival of the future. As to the best known of the triennial events, Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, and Norwich, he has much to say that has been said for years. Their appeal is confessedly not to the democracy but to the well-to-do, whereas the competition Festivals practically reverse this, and set every class of the community, including almost the lowest, working at music-making and critical listening. The antithesis is striking and suggestive. But does it really point to the advisability of the abandonment of the customary Festivals? Surely they have done much for musical progress, and deserve a more generous testimonial than Mr. Boughton in his desire for literary effect gives them. He sneers at 'Elijah,' the 'Redemption,' the 'Golden Legend,' and other works produced at the Festivals as 'polite stuff.' Mr. Boughton's own imaginative compositions have been performed on several Festival occasions, and we presume that, viewed as 'stuff,' they are not so polite. All the same, they have shared the fairly common dismal fate of Festival novelties in not being heard again.

In dealing with the formation and training of Festival choirs, and their effect upon local musical organizations, Mr. Boughton has much to say that is pertinent and true. But we demur to the statement that the choir that can properly interpret the Judaistic religion of Elijah will be quite unable to get at the heart of Bach's 'Passion' music. The emotions of a good choir are as expansive and comprehensive as the emotions of the man who trains them. But it may be admitted that Festival choirs have, as a rule, far more music allotted to them than they can in a short time assimilate and sing with self-expression. Festival choirs are often much too large for some of the music they sing, and this being so the true remedy is division of labour and concentration of sections on a limited programme.

Mr. Boughton sees, as many other critics now see, the great potentialities competition Festivals have in lifting up the whole community. We are glad to note Mr. Boughton's conversion, and trust that he will use his ability to serve the movement. He has a keen vision for imperfections, the existence of which all immersed in the work will admit, but he is not very helpful in constructive suggestions. The fact is the Competitive Festival movement is just now passing through some throes, inasmuch as it is suffering somewhat from the well-meant advice of critics who have not fully explored the paths which it has forged, and which to a large extent it must continue to follow. Mr. Boughton has some remarks on adjudication and adjudicators, with which we deal in the Competition Festival Record. And he has a tilt at the London musical critics. He says that there are not more than seven (half a score) are allowed for all England, three being in the provinces 'whose opinion is worth the paper it is written on.' Mr. Boughton was a London critic when this pamphlet was written, so we are left to speculate wildly as to the identity of the remaining six. The Festival of the future, according to Mr. Boughton, is to combine competition and to give concerts, a plan long ago adopted at Kendal and elsewhere. The event is to be a public holiday in the district or city, local resources are to be employed, and the best local composer is to be commissioned to compose a choral work, opera, or musical pageant. Here we pause to reflect. For further particulars we must refer inquirers to the pamphlet itself.

In an 'Occasional Note' in our last number (p. 514) we commented on the unconventional harmonizations to be found in Mr. Cyril Scott's 'Old Songs in a New Guise.' We timidly suggested that a certain A natural should be A flat, and as to this the publishers inform us that the A natural is a misprint. In view of what was perpetrated elsewhere how were we to know? We are also informed that in an article contributed to the Monthly Musical Record for June this year, Mr. Scott defends his treatment of these and other songs. We have read this article, but are still unconvinced that any body may do any thing—a doctrine which, it seems to us, is Mr. Scott's practical contention.

CHARLES YOUNG AND FAMILY.

BY WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

Mrs. Delany, writing to her sister on August 8, 1758, said: 'Mrs. Arne and Miss Bayly sing, and a girl of nine years old accompanies them on the harpsichord; she is a niece of Mrs. Arne's; the race of the Youngs are born songsters and musicians.'

The family she referred to were indeed songsters and musicians, but all published biographies, including the revised edition of Grove's 'Dictionary,' make a sad muddle of their relationship. Whilst writing the history of 'Dr. Arne and "Rule, Britannia,"' recently published by Novello & Co., I had access to numerous documents which enabled me to unravel the tangled thread of their pedigree.

Charles Young, senior, was born not later than 1688. I assume this to be the case because in 1709 he would have attained the age of twenty-one, in which year he married, as is proved by the official certificate: 'These are to certify whom it may concern that Charles Young, of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex, and Elizabeth Carter, of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, were married in the Parish Church of All Hallows, Barking, London, on the 23rd of June, 1709, as does appear by the Register Book of the said Parish. Witness my hand this 20th day of January, 1710.—John Gaskarth, Minister.'

The bridegroom, Charles Young, was appointed organist of All Hallows', Barking, four years later, with a salary of £20 per annum; probably he had deputed for his predecessor, Mr. Bryan, who may also have been his teacher. It has been suggested that Charles Young was a son of Anthony Young, who was the organist of St. Clement Danes; but this is impossible. Anthony Young was one of the choristers of the Chapel Royal, under Dr. Blow; and there is a record in 'The King's Musick,'* dated September 29, 1700, of a 'grant of cloth for Anthony Young and John Reading, two boys of the Chapel who have left on account of their voices having broken.' A boy who ceased to be a chorister in 1700 could not, in the nature of things, be the father of a man married in 1709. The probability is that Charles Young and Anthony Young were both about the same age.

* 'The King's Musick,' by H. C. De Lafontaine (Novello).

Two years after their marriage Charles Young and his wife, Elizabeth, were blessed with a daughter, Cecilia, born in 1711. She developed into a fine soprano vocalist, and in 1736 married Thomas Augustine Arne. She long survived her husband, Dr. Arne, and died in 1789. A second child, also a daughter, was named Isabella. She became an expert soprano singer, and married John Frederic Lampe, the well-known and successful composer; she outlived her husband forty-four years, dying in 1795.

It is worthy of note that their son, Charles John Frederic Lampe, succeeded his grandfather, Charles Young, as organist of All Hallows', Barking, in 1758, an appointment he held until his death in 1769. A third daughter named Esther, also a soprano vocalist, attained to fame as a public singer. She married Charles Jones, a musician of Welsh birth, a member of the King's Band, who was admitted to the Society of Musicians,* and signed the roll, on January 7, 1752. In 1715 Charles Young had born to him a son, who also was named Charles. Probably he inherited musical gifts, but through the personal interest of the Duke of Newcastle, who was a patron of Charles Young, senior, and sympathised with him in his serious losses by the failure of the South Sea Bank (1720), the son was appointed to a Senior Clerkship in the Treasury. He married Mary Babington, of Nantwich, Cheshire, and died in 1755, it is said of grief at the death of a son, John, who was a very promising Westminster scholar. Charles Young, junior, had thirteen children, but we are only interested in a daughter, Mary, born in 1751, who became a very accomplished musician, both singer and player. She was only four years old when her father died, and was then adopted by her aunt, Mrs. Arne, and thus came under the notice of Mrs. Delany, as narrated above. She had continuous instruction from her aunt, and constant practice in her art in public. She sang in a Pastoral sketch at Drury Lane Theatre on October 22, 1762, and four years after (in 1766) married Francis Hippolite Barthélemon, an accomplished violinist and composer. Together they pursued their professional avocations in Great Britain and on the Continent. In 1777 they were engaged during the Carnival at Leghorn, when they performed a composition for voice with violin obbligato, composed by Barthélemon, which excited the greatest enthusiasm, and culminated in the presentation of a eulogistic address to the lady. She died in 1799. The Barthélemons had one daughter, born September 1, 1767. She was named Cecilia Maria, and married, in 1797, Edward Prentis Henslowe, and as an amateur exhibited much knowledge and skill. She died on December 5, 1859, leaving interesting memorials of her musical ancestry.

It may be well to add a word or two respecting Anthony Young, the organist of St. Clement Danes. As already stated, a grant of clothing was made to him on leaving the Chapel Royal in 1700. Inquiries at St. Clement have failed to elicit any information respecting him; but he published a volume of music with the title 'Suits of Lessons for the Harpsichord or Spinnet in most of the Keyes with Variety of Passages and Variations throughout the Work. Compos'd by Mr. Anthony Young, Organist of St. Clements Danes. London: Printed for and Sold by I. Walsh, Servt. in Ordinary to His Majesty, at the Harp and Hoboy, in Catherine Street in the Strand, and I. Hare at the Viol and Flute, in Cornhill near the Royal Exchange.' There is no date given of publication, but it was probably 1720. The Spectator (No. 224, November 16, 1711) contains an advertisement as follows: 'For the Benefit of Mr. Anthony Young, Organist of St. Clements Danes, at Stationers Hall on Thursday the 22nd instant being St. Cecilia's day, will be performed a Consort of Vocal and Instrumental Musick, most of which will be entirely new; and Mr. Leveridge sings that celebrated song, beginning "Genius of England."'

Anthony Young signed the Declaration of Trust of the Society of Musicians on August 28, 1739. There is also the signature of John Young, junior, probably his son.

On page 5 of the book of Suits published by Anthony Young is printed a Saraband in triple time, which contains some passages bearing a very slight resemblance to the second part of the tune of 'God save the King.'

The date of Anthony Young's death has not been ascertained. It is quite certain he was not related to the Arne-Young family. He may have been a connection of John Young, of St. Paul's Churchyard, a violin and musical instrument-maker, who had a son, Talbot Young, a chorister in St. Paul's Cathedral, under Dr. Greene; the latter held music meetings every week at his father's house. As his patrons increased, he was obliged to remove to more commodious premises, first to the 'Queen's Head' in Paternoster Row, and later to the 'Castle' in the same street. He died in 1758. He had been appointed in 1719 to a post in the Chapel Royal, in place of Alexander Damascene. The Daily Post, Saturday, October 17, 1724, contained the following: 'We hear that near one hundred gentlemen and merchants of the City, have lately form'd themselves into a musical society, the one part Performers the other Auditors in St. Paul's Churchyard. They opened the Consort last week with a very good Performance, to the entire satisfaction and Pleasure of all the Members. Mr. Young of St. Paul's Churchyard, a noted Master of Science, and one of his Majesty's Chapel is President of the Same. As musick must be allow'd to be the most innocent and agreeable Amusement, and a charming Relaxation to the Mind, when fatigued with the Bustle of Business, or after it has been long bent on serious Studies, this bids fair for encouraging the Science, and seems to be a very ingenious and laudable Undertaking.'

Talbot Young added to his other qualifications that of organist. The vestry book of St. James Garlick Hill, in the City, under the date May 14, 1719, contains the following minute: 'At this Generall Vestry there was nominated for organist the persons following, that is to say, Mr. John Jones, Mr. Talbot Young, and Mr. Edward Hen. Purcell. The majority elected Mr. John Jones.'

This entry is very interesting, as it gives a peep into the career of the great Henry Purcell's grandson.

TEMPERAMENTS GRAPHICALLY CONTRASTED.

By W. B. MORTON, M.A., PROFESSOR OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, QUEEN'S COLLEGE, BELFAST.
DIATONIC SCALES.

The horizontal lines running across the diagram give the pitches of the natural harmonic scale. This is constructed so that the three major triads sound with the greatest possible smoothness, a smoothness attained when the vibrations made by the three notes are in the proportions of the numbers 4, 5, 6. Voices singing in unaccompanied harmony would be led naturally to adopt this scale through the smoothness of blending thereby attained. But for purposes of melody in a single part the ear can accept and become accustomed to quite different intervals, as is shown by the great variety of melodic scales which have actually been used. And the 'natural' scale has the drawback of containing two different sizes of tones. For example, the E, which would be the correct mediant in the key of C, is different from that which would serve for supertonic in the key of D. Hence the need for tempered scales. (See Musical Times, February, 1913.)

In the Pythagorean scale the notes are arrived at by taking a succession of perfect fifths, beginning with the subdominant. This works correctly until the supertonic is reached. But the next step, to submediant, is not a perfect fifth on the harmonic scale.

It contains two minor tones and one major, instead of two major and one minor. So the Pythagorean notes are too sharp from this point onward (submediant, mediant, and leading note) by the excess of a major over a minor tone, i.e., a 'comma.' An error of this amount is made by a violinist who, having tuned by perfect fifths, uses the open E string in the key of G.

In the old mean-tone tuning the difference between the major and minor tone was 'split.' The major third was therefore correct. Taking five of these 'mean-tones' out of the octave the remainder was divided into the two semitones, which were slightly too large. The black notes were tuned to suit the less remote keys. In consequence they were badly 'out' for keys having more than two flats or more than three sharps. The worst key was $G\sharp$, the scale of which is shown on the diagram. The common chords of this key were the 'wolves' of the old organs.

The last scale shows the ideal sought in the modern equal-tuning. Here, as is well known, the tones are all equal, and the semitone half a tone, and all keys are placed on an equality.

THE FUTURIST IN MUSIC.

BY D. C. PARKER.

‘Nur das Gesetz kann uns die Freiheit geben.’ †—Goethe.

‘Our thoughts create the future. Statesmen work after the plans which we leave behind us.’—Anatole France.

Music, like trade, has its cycles, and, like the social world, its fancies and its fashions. History is always repeating itself, but in spite of this fact, many regard the new as the unexpected. No sooner has the public become fully acquainted with the aims of a man than some inconsiderate intruder claims its attention and, through his works, makes a readjustment of all our ideas an imperative necessity. A younger generation scorns the pourpre du soir which sufficed for earlier romanticists. Music develops with great rapidity. Of all the arts it is the one concerning which remote ages teach us little or nothing. Of the love poem, of the meditation of the sage, of the work of the sculptor, we may learn much from the ancient civilisations. But what has happened to the music of antiquity? Of what nature were the strains which accompanied the progress of the beauty through her halls or the wanderings of the goat-herd upon his native hills? These simple pipings have not become obsolete. They have entirely disappeared.

If we look at the past we find many examples of the intruder. Even in the days which we are wont to associate with a persistent and innocent activity we see again and again the appearance of men who were not content to take things as they found them. If progress means protest and experimenting, the reason for the relatively swift development of musical art is easily explained. Monteverde, to whom, possibly, few modern musicians give much thought, was one of these: and, in his madrigals, he left severely alone many of those rules which had been consecrated by universal recognition on the part of the composer. And there is, surely, no thorough student of Bach who will deny that that master brought a fresh mind to all his labours, and discovered new worlds over which subsequent writers might wander. The works of such men prove that, in the days before the cross-currents of modern thought affected music, there existed composers who were eager to enlarge the scope and deepen the expressiveness of the art. In later times we find many more instances of men to whom we owe a real development in some department of music. Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner were certainly prominent among them. It is difficult to imagine the bitterness with which the innovations for which they were responsible were greeted. The heterodoxy of to-day is the orthodoxy of to-morrow, and we have now settled down comfortably to a recognition of the qualities of these writers. But signs are not wanting that we are not to be allowed to lapse into the intellectual sluggishness which results from moving among familiar things. Some may hold that Wagner was the last of the heroes, so far as we know at present. We shall have, however, to reconsider our position once more. The music of the future—la musique de l'avenir, Zukunftsmusik—is not music which assaults the world once in three or four centuries. It claims our attention every few years, and the periodical restlessness is overdue.

If we look at the men who are writing music to-day we shall find that in many cases we can trace their musical ancestry. In Germany this is particularly the case. Speaking in a rough and ready way, it would be true to say that most of the music is full of modifications of the Wagner ideal. Strauss occupies a place by himself. But Pfitzner, in ‘Der arme Heinrich,’ Max Schillings, in ‘Ingwelde,’ ‘Moloch,’ and his songs, Weingartner, D’Albert, and Humperdinck, in their music generally, appear as talented descendants of Wagner. Reger is of a different type, with a leaning now and then towards the Brahms tradition. It is, I think, more difficult to sum up the situation in France. There we find many spirits claiming a place in the sun. The origin of much of their output is difficult to determine. It may arise through an inherent contempt for obscurantism and scholasticism. It may owe its genesis to that resourcefulness and freshness which are typical of the French intellect. Whatever the reason, there is no doubt that much of the modern French music, some of which I imagine has been indirectly suggested by Debussy, shows that the French are determined to say new things in a new way. And this much may be admitted by the musician without his agreeing that the compositions of men like Ravel and Florent Schmitt have a future before them.

Even here we have not come to the end of the chapter. Of late there have been rumours of all kinds of extravagant incursions into the musical world, some of them capable of terrible significance. We are prone to forget that modern music is hydra-headed. No one man represents in himself more than a fraction of present-day activity. The fact that Strauss is the most prominent musician of to-day does not alter this fact. The mention of such names as those of Sibelius and Bantock, Glière and Medtner (of both of whom much has been written of late), Charentier and Scriabine, are surely sufficient to make this evident. And others have experimented in their own way. We have an example in Busoni’s ‘Entwurf einer neuen Aesthetik der Tonkunst.’ But all this pales before the report of a concert given at Rome by one Pratella, described as a ‘futurist musician.’ He indulges, so we are told in the most audacious chord combinations. His idea is, evidently, that Beethoven and Wagner have had their day, and that the song of humanity must contain the noise of tramways, taxis, and crowds. Coming after the threat which was made to invade music with fractions of tones and a complete alteration of the value of the degrees of the scale, this perhaps does not affect us very much. But it shows that the spirit of unrest is abroad.

A survey, however cursory, of contemporary activity cannot afford to omit a reference to Schönberg. About him opinions are widely divided. He is best known by the ‘Drei Klavierstücke,’ ‘Pierrot Lunaire’ and ‘Gurrelieder.’ Schönberg seems to have a liking for peculiar groups of instruments. ‘Pierrot Lunaire’ is written for pianoforte, violin (and viola), violoncello, flute (and piccolo), clarinet (and bass-clarinet), and speaking-voice. In the String quartet (Op. 10) we have the addition of a soprano voice in the last two movements, and in the Chamber Symphony some fifteen solo instruments. Whatever the compositions, Schönberg is certainly creating a stir. In a concert given in Vienna, and devoted, for the most part, to the works of Schönberg’s pupils, the items were greeted with laughter, hisses, and applause. Controversy over the ‘Gurrelieder’ was so great that the second performance was indefinitely postponed, owing, it is said, to a hint from the authorities. In the press, as in the concert-room, the advanced music is providing excitement. Critics cross swords over this ultramodern.

† ‘Only the law can give us freedom.’

To say that this music is misunderstood is not to say that it is bad. Criticism is based on knowledge, and if we do not know a man's process and speech we cannot pass judgment upon his work. Some think that the latest tendencies in music show a delicate relationship to those in painting, and that the most revolutionary writers are the musical equivalents of Matisse and Picasso and of the Cubist painters generally. Whether this applies to works like Scriabine's 'Extase' and 'Prometheus,' or to his pianoforte pieces like 'Enigme' and 'Désir' I cannot say. Others hold that present inclinations, if persisted in, will lead us to harmonic nihilism. We in England shall require to become much more familiar with this music before we can say anything very definite about it. But it cannot be too strongly stated that the right kind of modernism is based on the past. Any modern movement which cuts us off from Bach, Beethoven, and Wagner, which regards these men as of no further value for the musical world, is doomed. There may be a future for this cult or for that, but for a futurism which breaks absolutely with the great past I can see no abiding prosperity. All healthy spirits must rejoice at the continual manifestation of new ideas. Experience would almost seem to teach that in the best musicians there is something of the natural revolutionary. Did not Chopin celebrate the fall of Warsaw in an etude? Did not Wagner find his name prominent in the Dresden revolt? Did not Schumann sing the cause of liberty in male-voice choruses? And it may be that the younger voices wish to pipe another strain, to take the 'new paths' of which Schumann wrote. Doubtless some of them feel the need of what Nietzsche described as 'a pitch opposed to the normal average.' And this spirit is nursed by the natural antagonism of that overwhelming section of the public which is always conservative: for many people are like the ancient chieftains of whom Anatole France writes—they asked for the old stories which 'they believed to have been dictated by a divinity, and mistrusted the new songs.' Of contemporary music there must of necessity be many opinions at the present time, as an audience is made up of heterogeneous elements. This applies to the output of some men who are no longer with us, such as Gustav Mahler and César Franck. A serious examination of present conditions brings home the necessity of testing all things carefully. This is the great lesson which a survey of music from Monteverde to Schönberg makes evident.

THE BARLESS PSALTER.*

This new system of chanting has occasioned considerable interest and has led to many inquiries as to what peculiar advantages are claimed for its principles. The following quotation from the Preface will serve to give some general idea of its object and means of accomplishment:

The object of all Psalters is to secure unanimity among the singers, and the effort to get this unanimity has led to increasing complexity in the means of indicating the pointing. The chief cause of this complexity is in the idea that each half-verse must be treated as two parts—the former recited as in reading, the latter sung as in ordinary barred music. This unfortunate view has created a difficulty at the point of junction in each half-verse, and various means have been adopted in the attempt to surmount this difficulty.

The editors are convinced not only that this idea is fundamentally wrong, but also that it is the great obstacle to an easy and intelligent rendering of the Psalms. They believe that the true conception is that each half-verse is entirely homogeneous, the inflexion being merely a variation of pitch, and only approximately represented by barred music.

This is a return to first principles, and involves what is at the present time an unusual treatment of the Anglican chant, which, though known, is not yet generally adopted. Thus the inflexion must not be considered to consist of bars of equal duration, nor must even the notes in one bar be necessarily equal in value; all that is left and all that is required is (1) the variation of pitch to avoid monotony, and (2) the accent which gives the rhythmical feeling. Moreover, the accents need not be equal in strength, and the intensity of the accented note will depend on the word or syllable with which it is associated, while in some cases it will scarcely be apparent.

The basis of all pointing should be good and therefore deliberate reading, consequently each verse has been so marked that the inflexion of the chant, when rendered freely, will not interfere with the phrasing of the sentence.

The result of treating the whole verse (including the inflexion) in this manner is that very few pointing indications are necessary; such marks as are used are common to all printing, bear their ordinary significance, and in no way obscure the text. The reduction in the number of the marks is a great gain, because it leads to a better grasp of the meaning of the verse; for it must be remembered that this Psalter is marked not with the idea of compelling the singer to chant correctly, which would be an impossible feat, but to enable him to sing the inflexion with that easy rendering which approximates most closely to good reading.

The authors claim for their Psalter that:

It is based upon the principle of making the sense of the words the first consideration, and this vital principle is not only enunciated in the Preface but carried out in the book.

It enables the singer to chant intelligently without running the risk of being upset by an asterisk, or an accent, or other sign.

It makes the reasonable assumption that intelligence is not confined to the choir-master, but exists also in the choir.

It does not add to but lightens the labour of the choir-master, inasmuch as it produces a musical rather than a mechanical body of singers.

It treats the Anglican chant in the manner of recitative, and so makes it possible to give the true verbal accentuation. [It should be noted that before criticising the accentuation, verbal or musical, the reader must entirely clear his mind of the rigid fixed rhythm of the chant to which he has been accustomed.]

It is printed and arranged so as to make it easy, when singing, both to read and to find the place.

It is one of the few pointed psalters that provide explanations of difficult passages and words. The notes placed at the end of each group of Morning and Evening Psalms form a short commentary.

It requires the use of chants of the simplest pattern, i.e., two sections of four and six notes respectively, without florid excrescences. A carefully-selected set of such chants will be published in the autumn of 1913.]

The normal musical accentuation of the chant is given thus:

Ex. 1.

That is to say, the final note in each section, which is always assigned to the last syllable, may be strong or weak according to the strength of that syllable. If weak, the last three notes are treated as forming a triplet.

* The Barless Psalter, for use with Anglican chants, edited by Walter Marshall, M.A., and Seymour Pile, M.A., F.R.C.O. (Novello).

Another interesting use of the triplet occurs in the following manner :

Ex. 2.

Thus the last syllable of the recitation carries the accent, the two following notes of the inflexion forming the remainder of the triplet.

This is apparently carried further so as to embrace the penultimate syllable of the recitation :

Ex. 3.

thus giving a quartet of notes.

The plan has now to wait the verdict of those who are giving it a fair trial.

Church and Organ Music.

THE ORGANS OF ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

By ANDREW FREEMAN.

The old Chapel of St. John's was an extremely interesting building, dating back to the latter half of the 13th century. It remained in use till June, 1868, when it was demolished in order that it might not hide any part of the new Chapel which had taken its place! Thus lightly did the authorities part with a building in which had centred the most sacred associations of the College since its foundation.

Rectangular in shape, and divided into three portions—Chapel (or Quire), ante-chapel, and vestibule—it formerly possessed four chantry chapels, two on either side, the two on the north side remaining until the end. One of these, situated at the east end of the north side of the Quire, was built by Bishop Fisher between 1525 and 1533, and directly above it was a room opening into the Quire by a large arch. Later on—some time between 1559 and 1564—this arch was blocked up in order that the room might be turned into an 'apartment for the advantage of the master,' but there can be little doubt that the place was designed as an organ-chamber and so used for many years.

From the list of Benefactors drawn up in 1528, we learn that 'Sondry and divers marchauntes in London gave amongst theyme x^{li} towards the byeing of the newest organynes.' This is, I believe, the earliest mention of an organ yet found in the College Records, but a quarter of a century later, according to the Audit Book for 1557-58, we find that three shillings was expended in 'makyng a lecturne for ye orgaines in the quere.'

When the organ-chamber was bricked up, the instrument was either erected in another part of the Chapel, or, more probably, removed altogether, a fate shared by many other organs (that at King's College, Cambridge, amongst them) in the early years of Queen Elizabeth's reign. Indeed it is most likely that the removal of the organ served as an excuse for the secularisation of the organ-chamber, now no longer required.

In 1634-35 the Chapel was embellished and beautified, and a new organ was set up in the organ-loft at the west end of the Quire, between the Chapel and the ante-chapel. It was built by Robert Dallam, as is shown by the following extract* from the Lease Book for the years 1627-68 :

Articles and Covenantes of Agreement indented and made and agreed vpon the eight and twentieth day of July Anno Domini 1635, Annoque Regni Regis Caroli Angliae etc vndecimo Betweene William Beale doctor of divinity and Master of the Colledge of St John the Evangeliste in the University of Cambridge the fiellowes and Schollers of the same Colledge on the one part and Robert Dallam of the City of Westminster Organ-maker on the other part as followeth. In witness whereof as well the said Master fellows and Schollers theyr Common Seale as also the said Robert Dallam his seale to these presents Interchangeably have putt the day and year first above written.

It will be noticed that though there were to be six complete stops the names of five only were given. The list is, however, exactly as given in the Lease Book, as I was able to verify through the kindness and courtesy of the present Master, Mr. Scott.

In 1636, Dallam was paid 40s. 'for tuneing and repaying the Organs,' and in 1638, £2 6s. 8d., including his journey from London

THE ORGAN IN ST. MARK'S CHURCH, OLD BILTON, NEAR RUGBY.

An Inventory taken at the College Audit of 1642 makes mention of 'one pair of organs,' but from the Audit Book of 1642-43 we find that £2 8s. 6d. was 'payed by Mr. Heron the Ju. Bursar for taking down the pictures and the organs and whiting the walls,' and a year later 6s. 8d. was 'paid to old Dowsy when the organ case was taken away.'

The organ, which had been thus preserved from the fate which overtook so many others during the Commonwealth was set up very shortly after the Restoration, and choral services once more resumed. This much can be gathered from the Account Books of the College, which show that in the second Quarter of 1661 £1 was paid 'To Mr. Lusemore for learneing ye choristers,' and £1 10s. for 'learneing ye organist.' [The Loosemore above referred to was in all probability Dr. George Loosemore, organist of Trinity College Chapel from 1660 to 1682, in which year he appears to have died. His father, Henry Loosemore

(d. 1670), was organist of King's College Chapel, while his brother, John, is known to fame as the builder of the organ in Exeter Cathedral. In 1682, Thomas Williams took Loosemore's place as teacher of the choristers.]

To return to the organs :

1661. To Will Key for worke in y ^e org ^a chāber	15	9	½
1663. To Mr. Thayer for Tuneing ye organ	1	5	0
1669. To John Ivory for painting the case of ye great organ & grounding ye pipes with blew & goulding the armes & balls at ye top, per bill	02	00	00
To Mr. Tho. Thamer for 3 weekes work & materials for mending both ye organs, per bill	04	00	00

The last two are perhaps the most interesting of all the entries after 1660, for they prove that the instrument was either a double organ (that is, one with separate cases for the great and choir organs, with the organist's seat between the two), or that there were two organs in the Chapel at the time. I shall return to this point later, when referring to the existing cases of this old organ. Here, I only venture to suggest that not long before 1669 a Choir organ and case had been added to Dallam's Great organ (the work, in all probability, being executed by Thamar), and that the older portion was thereupon embellished to make it accord with the newer addition. The scheme of decoration hinted at is suggestive. We can well imagine that the case presented a rich and handsome appearance.*

Thamar (the name is variously spelt) was employed at several other Cambridge Colleges between 1658 and 1684. He had charge of the organ at St. John's up to and including the year 1684, with the exception of the year 1683, when Henry Smart was paid 30s. for 'mending ye organ.' In 1686, for a like service, the same fee was given to one Wm. Oliver.

In 1777 and 1778 a local builder named Argent received £80 for cleaning and repairing the instrument, and 'tuning it to concert pitch.'

In 1833 T. A. Walmisley came to Cambridge as organist of St. John's and Trinity Colleges, and before long the organs in both Chapels were rebuilt under his direction. The work at St. John's was done by Hill, in 1838, at a cost of £800, only the case and some of the pipes being retained. The specification of the organ after this rebuild will be found in all three editions of Hopkins & Rimbault. The compass of Great and Choir manuals was from FFF to f⁸ (61 notes) and of the Swell from FF to f⁸ (49 notes). The Pedals were also of FFF compass.

In 1868 the instrument was entirely rebuilt by Hill, at a cost of £1,000, and was then placed in Sir Gilbert Scott's new Chapel (consecrated on May 12, 1869), where it occupies a raised position above and behind the stalls on the north side of the Quire. The old cases were not utilised, but were fortunately not destroyed. Scott seems to have designed new cases, which were to be put in position when funds permitted; but when this time came, in 1889, the drawings could not be found, so new ones were prepared by his son, Mr. J. Oldrid Scott. At the same time the organ was again enlarged by Messrs. Hill & Son.

The last reconstruction was placed in the hands of Messrs. Norman & Beard, in 1902.† Some of Dallam's pipes of 1635 still remain.

* At some subsequent time the front pipes were gilt, that being their condition when the organ was taken down in 1868.

† The complete specification will be found in the Musical Times for December, 1902, and December, 1904.

The old cases which, as we have seen, were discarded in 1868, came under the notice of the late Rev. R. O. Assheton, Rector of St. Mark's, Old Bilton, near Rugby. This gentleman bought the Great organ case, and had it most carefully and judiciously restored under the direction of his friend, the late Rev. F. H. Sutton. A new interior was fitted to it by Messrs. Nicholson & Son, of Worcester, and it was then set up in Old Bilton Church, where it has remained ever since. The upper part of the case projects from the north wall of the chancel over the keyboards, the main portion of the instrument being placed in the vestry behind. The design of the case is quite simple: a semi-octagonal tower in the centre, a flat on either side flanked by a V-tower. The front pipes are quite plain, except that the lips (which are of the rounded, or French, pattern) are gilt. The case itself, which is of plain oak, is also relieved by gilding. The carving, amongst which the Tudor Rose and Portcullis (emblems of the Lady Margaret, Foundress of St. John's College) will be noticed, is excellent, giving a rich and pleasing appearance to the front, while the effect is further improved by the three 'spirettes' which tower midway between them, and two connecting curtains which are ogee in plan as well as in elevation.

The ogee curve was, of course, a characteristic feature of English Gothic architecture in the 14th century, and was sometimes, though (I believe) rarely, introduced into early Renaissance work (I am speaking of organ-cases): for instance, in the west front of Thomas Dallam's organ-case at King's College Chapel, Cambridge, built in 1606. But the Brownsover case affords an exceptional and noteworthy example of its use in plan—quite the earliest that I have hitherto come across. Were it not for the V-towers and for the known facts of its history recorded above, I should be inclined to assign a considerably later date than 1669 to this case. That it does not form part of the work executed in 1838 is, I think, conclusively proved by the reference to it in Sir John Sutton's 'Short account of Organs.'* Speaking of this organ in connection with the havoc wrought by the Parliamentarians, he says—'This organ was likewise amongst the fortunate instruments, the soldiers contenting themselves with breaking the east window of the Chapel. It remained till 1840. The Choir organ of this instrument, the writer conjectures to have been of somewhat later date from the form of the case which still remains.' Though he did not know how the organ had been preserved, for the documents were not then accessible, Sir John Sutton was intimately acquainted with the organ and the work done at its rebuild in 1839.

On the whole, I think that the claim of this beautiful little case to date from the first decade after the Restoration is fairly established.

It is delightful to know that these two beautiful and historic cases have been preserved, yet a matter of keen regret that by a like method of procedure, many others of equal merit were not saved to adorn the churches of our land. In the old days no one ever dreamed of putting up an organ that was not a thing of beauty as well as of service, and thus doubly worthy of its place in the sanctuary. We have not so many fine cases, new or old, that we can afford to let one of these time-honoured relics perish or pass out of our sight. Even when it is not of the very highest type nor in the purest style it would serve to cover up some of the many eyesores that disfigure some of our noblest churches to the discredit of all concerned. As the expression of a sincere purpose and consecrated effort such a work is priceless. Let us then think kindly and gratefully of those who by their zeal and foresight have enabled us to rejoice in the possession of two such specimens of splendid and conscientious craftsmanship as now grace the churches at Old Bilton and Brownsover.

THE COMPLEAT ORGANIST.

BY HARVEY GRACE.

I.—OF VOLUNTARIES.

The word 'voluntary' is an accommodating, elastic term, whose prime meaning is uncertain. Some tell us that various preludes and interludes were so called because they were improvised. Others have it that the organ pieces to which the choir entered and the congregation dispersed were called voluntaries because they formed no part of the service, and so were played or not, at the discretion of the organist. Early in its musical career the word took on a more technical flavour by being applied to a definite musical form, if that can be called definite

THE ORGAN IN BROWNSOVER CHURCH, NEAR RUGBY.

Mr. Sutton added above the towers. These 'spirettes' and the 'hang-over' were the only alterations made, except that the return ends which, in 1838, had been made to project wing-like at the sides, to the disfigurement of the case, were now restored to their original and proper position.

The Choir organ case found its way to Brownsover Church, a small but interesting edifice a few miles the other side of Rugby, a small instrument with one manual and pedals and six stops being fitted into it.

Unfortunately, the necessary additions to this case were not carried out with the same restraint as was displayed at Old Bilton. The result is that the lower portions of the front and sides are completely covered with heavy carving which detracts considerably from the general effect, though fortunately it cannot spoil the unmistakable charm of the upper portion. The front pipes, decorated in light brown and gold, are grouped so as to form two V-towers, a small rounded which was one of the most formless of creations. The 'voluntaries' of a couple of centuries ago were indeed a mixed breed. They ranged from highly-decorated versions of Psalm-tunes, via grave Diapason movements and strident 'trumpet pieces' (with naive echoes on the newly-invented 'swelling-organ') up to the classic dignity of Preludes and Fugues. The palmy period of the 'voluntary' was the century from 1720 to 1830, and the best specimens were provided by Croft, Beckwith, Keeble, Boyce, Greene, Battishill, Kelway, Samuel Wesley, Russell, and Adams. Some of their worthiest efforts have been given a deserved new lease of life by their re-issue in the series of 'Old English organ music,' edited by John E. West. A certain sturdy vigour and wholesomeness make them still well worth playing, and after a liberal dose of spicy and over-stimulating modern music, a few meals of this simple fare is a sound prescription. After a century of more or less honourable life, the voluntary began to suffer from the competition of the organ transcription. It soon had the worst of the fight—a fight that has gone on ever since, and one in which organ-music proper has gradually gotten the upper hand, though it will never entirely oust the transcription. The voluntary of to-day may be anything or nothing,—a Mendelssohn or Rheinberger Sonata or a Bach work at one end of the scale, and a few meandering chords at the other. Between these two extremes of highly organized music and entirely unorganized platitudes, with what infinite variety do we not meet! Here we shall find a choice of nothing but the best, played often enough to deaf ears; there the very worst, organist and the many-headed in perfect accord, deep calling to deep. Complaints in the ecclesiastical and musical Press are surprisingly rare, but it is a significant comment on the taste of organists that they are invariably directed at flippancy and vulgarity. As long ago as March 28, 1712, we find in the Spectator a protest against 'merry Epilogues after Tragedies, and Jigging Voluntaries.' Says the writer: 'When the preacher has often with great Piety and Art enough handled his Subject, and the judicious clerk has with utmost Diligence culled out two staves proper to the Discourse, and I have found in myself and in the rest of the Pew good thoughts and dispositions, they have been all in a moment dissipated by a merry Jig from the Organ Loft,'—a state of things by no means uncommon to-day.

Another complaint appears in 'The Parish Choir or Church Music Book' (1847), in the Answers to Correspondents: 'We cannot agree with H.E.D.,' runs the Editorial pronouncement, 'in the entire repudiation of voluntaries, and confining the use of the organ entirely to the accompaniment of the choir. We are quite ready to agree with H.E.D. that the manner in which organ voluntaries are played and the subjects chosen for them are often excessively indecent, and that they are often intruded where they have no use but to regale idle ears with brilliant music, and to relieve the puritanical monotony of the dialogue between the reader and clerk in churches where the solemn chant of the Church is regarded as too carnal. But before the commencement of divine service we believe there is good authority for an organ symphony.'

Grows as to the tyranny of the organist in various ways,—his loud accompanying, choice of too elaborate choir music, the secular nature of his recital performances, and so on,—appear fairly frequently in the Press; but we have yet to find the organist rebuked for playing music of too good a type. Truth to say, it is not a common failing, and one would welcome a few columns of letters such as the following:

The Editor, Church News.

Sir,—We have at St. Britius a four-manual organ—one of Messrs. Howell & Baxter's finest pieces of work—containing many delightful stops (vox angelica, vox celeste, vox seraphique, vox humana, corno angelorum, piccolo ethereal, &c.), indeed in the matter of our instrument we are greatly and singularly blessed. We have a large congregation, who, thanks to our former highly-gifted organist, take keen pleasure in listening to its strains. I have seen a crowded church literally spellbound while Mr. — gave his variations on a vesper hymn (a charming little thing of his own) or that moving 'Pilgrims' song of hope' of Batiste. Now in his stead we have a young man not altogether without ability of a sort, but with no idea of catering for the public taste. Instead of the music that we understood and loved, he gives us works by Bach, Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, et hoc genus omne. I and my churchwardens have remonstrated with him, and I gather from various members of our congregation that they have ventured to do the same, but in vain. His only answer is that if people have no liking for the best, so much the worse for them. He even so far forgot himself as to say that while in religious matters he was prepared to sit at my feet, and lay his hand on his mouth, in the matter of organ music he deferred to none of the clergy other than those who were qualified by study to give an opinion.

Can nothing be done to show such heady young men that the organ is the property of the incumbent and churchwardens, that they are as much our servants as the verger, and that we who pay the piper have also the right to call the tune?—Yours truly,

HOPLEY PORTER,

St. Britius, Bermondsey.

As the voluntary now belies its title, having become a regular feature in our churches, it may be useful to ask what kind of music is best for the purpose. If we may judge from the constant stream of new organ-music,—good, indifferent, and very bad—for which there is presumably a demand, an extraordinary variety of standard obtains. Perhaps we shall be helped if we begin by considering the object of the voluntary. Taking the in-voluntary first, if it be regarded merely as a useful noise for the covering up of the footsteps of the choir and clergy, then the famous Prelude of S. S. Wesley, who once showed his disapproval of something or somebody by putting down the lowest pedal note, and slowly building up and sustaining a chord of C, answers the purpose as well as anything else. Indeed, on musical grounds, there is much to be said for it as opposed to some organ-music inflicted on us, inasmuch as it is at least void of offence. If we regard the in-voluntary not merely as a covering for noise, but also as an introduction to—and therefore to some extent as a part of—the service, we shall not be overstating the case if we say that it ought to be as much in keeping as any of the choir music. To fulfil this demand, it should be carefully chosen and prepared. Instead, what happens at quite fifty per cent. of our churches?

The organist is in the vestry until the last minute or two before the service is due to begin, keeping—or not keeping—order. At the last moment he rushes to the console, generally in a state of irritation, adjusting his surplice or hood en route, throws his legs over the bench, draws out a few stops and all the couplers, starts arranging his service music with his left hand, puts his right foot on the swell pedal, while with the remaining limbs he begins on this wise:

Now why should he inflict this kind of thing on his hearers twice a week? Even if he be a clever improviser he may easily abuse his gift. It may be worth while to remind him, that delightful as his unpremeditated strains may be, the considered work of the best organ composers is sometimes even better. The cleverest of organists has no more right to give us his own organ-music first, last, and all the time, than to fill the choir library with his own anthems and canticles.

There is much to be said for making a feature of the organ music before the service. In the first place, it has an advantage over the postlude in that the congregation is able to listen. Most of them are in their places some ten minutes before the service begins. The footfalls of later arrivals are usually quiet, even apologetic, and, as noise, not to be compared with that of the exodus at the end. Here is the organist's opportunity of playing movements that are too quiet to be used as postludes, and too severe for recital purposes. There is perhaps a greater wealth of really good organ music of this kind than of any other. There are hundreds of beautiful pieces, besides slow movements of sonatas and choral preludes galore. Perhaps no modern organ composer has given us a greater number of short pieces of the highest class than Rheinberger. They would keep his name green even without the fine Sonatas. There are Twelve Monologues, Twelve Characteristic Pieces, Twelve Meditations, Twelve Pieces (Op. 174), Six Short Pieces, and Twenty-two Trios. It is not too much to say that there is not a weak number among them, and two-thirds of them are quiet and suitable for introductory voluntaries. The time taken in performance varies from two to six minutes. One might quite well play through the whole of them at the rate of two or three a week, and at the end begin the series again, without wearying himself or his audience, so good is the music. Instead, we find them mainly used for teaching purposes (for which they are excellent), but otherwise neglected by the majority of organists. Then there are countless choral preludes by Bach and his contemporaries (some of whom deserve a better fate than to be completely overshadowed by him), and by modern German writers. In the works of Bach alone enough suitable music may be found to supply the greater part of a year's Sundays. The organist who draws on them in this way will be pleasantly surprised at the rapidity with which they will gain public favour. Played in these quiet moments before the service, they find the hearers in the most receptive frame of mind, and indeed, from their nature, they can make their appeal at hardly any other time. What can be better for the opening of a service than such strains as this, on 'Nun komm, der Heiden Heiland'?

No music can be less of the earth, earthy, than this. I can never hear these solemn opening measures without thinking of the quiet, slow unfolding of great doors.

There are many such movements of Bach that are not heard so frequently as they should be,—for example, 'Schmücke dich,' 'O Mensch, bewein,' the three Preludes on 'Vater unser,' 'Wachet auf,' 'Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten,' 'Von Gott will ich nicht lassen' (these last two with the theme in pedals with 4-ft. stop), and the beautiful 'Wenn wir in höchsten,' the old man's deathbed composition.

Again, while every organist, from his pupilage to his nonage, plays the so-called 'Giant Fugue,' how many give even a second glance at the five-part (double pedal) setting of the tune ('Wir glauben all' in einen Gott') on which the fugue subject is founded? There it is, waiting to be played—a splendid study, and as beautiful a piece of five-part work as shall easily be found, even in Bach. The choral preludes are yearly becoming better known in England, but there are still far too many congregations to whom the name of Bach suggests nothing but loud, quick fugues. Bach's worst enemy is the organist who works some half-dozen fugues to death (usually playing them without practice), just as his best friend is a conductor such as Sir Henry Wood. There are more Bach enthusiasts made at Queen's Hall than in twenty average churches.

A long list might easily be made of neglected organ-music suitable for before-service voluntaries. Space does not permit, however, nor is it necessary. Every organist has only to turn over his library to find dozens of beautiful works that he has never played. I have mentioned Bach and Rheinberger as composers whose bigger works are widely appreciated, but whose smaller and quieter, but not less—perhaps even more—beautiful pieces are too often left alone. Let me make up a trio by adding a great modern French organ writer—Widor. Most organists have in their libraries his eight Symphonies. How many of the movements do they play? As I am dealing now with organ-music for in-voluntaries, I will draw attention only to the beautiful slow movements, which are among the very best of their kind, but are rarely heard. There are seventeen of them. Those in the first four Symphonies are of only moderate difficulty, while the Choral in the seventh and the Cantabile and Adagio in the eighth are tougher propositions. Only one quiet movement is widely played, apparently,— the Andante Cantabile in the fourth Symphony. No one grudges this delicious piece its popularity, but it may be confidently said that there are several others of Widor's slow movements that have only to be as well known to be quite as well liked. Their beauties are perhaps less obvious; indeed, some of them almost repel at first, for Widor can be, and often is, dry and involved, and somewhat on the lengthy side. But the way, though at times hard, is constantly refreshed by beautiful turns of melody, sudden harmonic warmths, or passages of such admirable texture as this from the Prelude in the second Symphony:

This article is not concerned with Widor's organ-music, so I must resist the temptation to dwell on a set of slow movements containing some of the most beautiful of modern organ-music. They are mentioned here because many of them, like certain of the choral preludes of Bach, are conceived in a vein that makes them specially suitable for playing before a service. This very quality also makes them less satisfactory for recital or postludial purposes, and the average organist's fondness for making his own in-voluntaries (after the manner of illustration No. 1) has caused them to be shelved.

There is one small difficulty in the way of playing set pieces before the service. In churches where punctuality is not the rule, the organist runs the risk of finding himself at the end before the choir has entered. This necessitates a meandering anti-climax. If the unpunctuality is caused by the unreadiness of the choir, the remedy is in the organist's own hands. If he suffer from an unpunctual vicar, he may have some difficulty, but there must be very few churches where it cannot be arranged for the choir to leave the vestry at the first stroke of the clock. This done, it remains only to time the music. If organists will but make up their minds to be at the console ten (or at least five) minutes before the service, prepared to play some well-chosen piece or pieces, they will add enormously to the edification of the congregation, and will soon count the time so spent as amongst the most enjoyable few minutes of the week. Moreover, this good organ music, carefully played, will put both organist and people in tune for the service. We organists need constantly to remind ourselves that ours is the first word in every service. Before the voices of clergy or choir are heard, we have our say. People may, by a hasty departure, escape our postludes, they may easily avoid our recitals, they may even, by concentrating their minds on the words being sung, ignore much of our accompanying, but if they are timely arrived they must needs hear our preludes. Are we to annoy the musical among them by slovenly rambling, or to prepare the ground for what is to follow by playing such music as that from which I have quoted? Of the ten per cent. who are really gifted at improvisation I say nothing, but what of the remaining ninety? On the principle of making the punishment fit the crime, I can imagine nothing more crushing than the recording of their 'extemporizations' on the gramophone, and compelling them to hear on Monday morning (when their vitality is at its lowest) that which they inflicted on their congregation's ears the day before. I believe one dose would be enough. I can imagine many an organist, thus hoist with his own petard, crying out, 'Heavens! did I play THAT?' and, a humbler and wiser man, hieing him to his organ loft to make more seemly provision for the future.

Mr. Alex. S. Crew, of Highbury New Park, writes:

I have recently returned from Buenos Aires, and think the accompanying specification of the organ in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Lomas, will interest your readers. The church is a small suburban one, and considering it is 7,000 miles from England, in a Roman Catholic country, may I think be permitted a certain pride in the possession of such an instrument. The services are conducted in the English language, and so far as the Protestant Churches are concerned, the organ holds second place in the Argentine Republic. The thanks of those who now enjoy it are due to the late organist, Mr. J. Hampden Wall, who conducted the principal oratorios and symphony concerts in Buenos Aires, and who is now returning permanently to England. The organ was built in 1904, and a tremulant has recently been added. The blowing power is electric.

The annual meeting of the Church Music Society was held in July in the King's Bench Lecture Room. The Society has over 600 members. In the course of the discussions, Miss Gregory, one of the secretaries, speaking of Sir Walter Parratt's remarks on the Society which he made at the Royal College of Organists' dinner (see Musical Times, July, p. 467), said that Sir Walter had not attended most meetings of the Society, and if he was anxious to reform it he should come and try to do so. After the meeting there was a short choral service in the Temple Church. The music included Merbecke's setting of the Lord's Prayer, Palestrina's 'Veni Sancte Spiritus,' Pearsall's anthem 'The rulers seek my life,' two Preludes by Sir Hubert Parry, and Sir Charles V. Stanford's arrangement of 'As now the sun's declining rays.'

- Mr. J. Banning, organist and choirmaster, St. John's Church, Deansgate, Manchester.

COMING FESTIVALS.

GLOUCESTER AND LEEDS.

The Gloucester Festival takes place on September 7 to 12, inclusive. There will be a great opening service in the Cathedral on Sunday, September 7, at 3 o'clock, in which the full orchestra and choir will take part. September 8 will be occupied with rehearsals, and on the morning of the 9th 'Elijah' will be performed. On the evening of this day Brahms's Symphony in D and 'The dream of Gerontius' will be given. On the morning of the 10th, Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion will be performed, and at the evening concert in the Shire Hall a miscellaneous programme will include a performance of Mozart's B flat Piano-forte concerto by Dr. Camille Saint-Saëns, and the introduction of a new Scena for soprano and orchestra composed by Sibelius, to be sung by Madame Ackté, who will also sing the closing scene in Strauss's 'Salome.' The great novelty of the Festival is the new oratorio 'The Promised Land,' by Saint-Saëns, which was fully analysed in our August issue. This will be produced on the morning of September 11, in the Cathedral. Elgar's second Symphony, a new Motet by Stanford, and Sir Hubert Parry's 'Te Deum' will also be given in the second half of the programme. On the evening of the 11th Verdi's 'Requiem,' and selections from 'Parsifal' and from 'Israel in Egypt' will be performed, and on the morning of the 12th the usual performance of the 'Messiah' will take place. The singers engaged are announced in our advertisement columns. Dr. A. Herbert Brewer, organist of Gloucester Cathedral, will be the general conductor. Dr. Sinclair (Hereford) and Dr. Ivor Atkins (Worcester) will play the organ.

The Leeds Festival will be held on October 1 to 4. The programme contains several novelties by British composers, the most important of which is the new orchestral Symphonic-poem by Sir Edward Elgar, which is fully described by the composer elsewhere in the present issue. We gave an outline of the full programme in our April issue (p. 231). The other novelties are the choral works, 'On a May morning,' by Dr. Basil Harwood, and 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' by Hamilton Harty, about which we hope to have something more to say in our next issue.

Reviews.

Missa O Quam Gloriosum. Composed by T. L. Vittoria.

Edited and adapted to English words by Walter S. Vale.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

It is conjectured that Tommaso Ludovico da Vittoria was born at Avila, in Spain, in 1540, and that he died at Madrid early in the 17th century. Although a Spaniard by birth he is classed as belonging to the Roman school, of which he was one of the greatest ornaments. The Mass now under review was, the editor states, written on motives from the composer's Motet for All Saints' Day. It has been transposed a minor third higher so that the treble and alto parts may be more singable and effective. The work is one of the noblest examples of the composer's style: dignified and broad, and with a constant musical interest. All the numbers, Kyrie Eleison, Credo (a fine setting), Sanctus, Benedictus, Hosanna, Agnus Dei, and Gloria in Excelsis, are in four-parts; and the music never presents any difficulty. No doubt it demands voices of good sonority for bringing out its possibilities of effect.

Choirs that prefer solid material that will survive the wear and tear of practices will revel in this polyphonic music with its rich harmonies and flowing melodic imitative counterpoint. Except for the opening Kyrie, English words have been adapted by the Editor.

Vesperale seu Liber Antiphonarius pro Vesperis et Completorio. Vatican edition.

The new edition of the 'Vesperale,' bearing the imprint of L. Schwann, Dusseldorf, is a really magnificent volume as regards paper, typography, and binding. Catholic choirs now have the approved chants for Vespers and Complin in accordance with the Motu Proprio of Pope Pius X., and the music, in Gregorian notation, is exactly conformable to the Vatican Edition. In this edition the psalm-verses are pointed so as to be accurately sung according to the psalm-tones. The appendix supplies the words and music of the hymns according to ancient usage, as permitted to be sung by prescription or by special indult. No doubt ere long an edition in modern notation will be issued, but for those who can read the plain-chant setting on a four-line stave the present edition is unsurpassed; the only fault is that the book, by reason of its 950 pages, printed on good paper, is rather heavy, on which account an edition on India paper would be desirable. The price is extremely moderate.

A cycle of songs. Set to music for S.A.T.B. by W. W. Starmer.

This cycle consists of four part-songs—'Queen and huntress' (Ben Jonson), 'Waken, lords and ladies gay' (Walter Scott), 'Pack, clouds, away' (Thomas Heywood), 'Twilight time' (John Askham)—all composed expressly for the Dover Triennial Festival, 1913. Mr. Starmer has not adopted a modern idiom that leads to tonal and rhythmic entanglement. His music is simple and easy, and therefore possible for any ordinary choral society, and sung with spirit and light and shade is certain to give pleasure to all concerned either as performers or listeners.

Correspondence.

THE ENGLISH POINT OF VIEW.

TO THE EDITOR OF ‘THE MUSICAL TIMES.’

SIR,—Mr. Kidson is rather disingenuous in his reply to my article, and he charges me with having misquoted him.

1. He begins his article by repudiating the statement that the earliest appearance in print of the tune is in The Gentleman's Amusement, circa 1810, and he adds that he never made such a statement ‘neither in Grove's Dictionary nor elsewhere.’ What are the facts? Here are his exact words in ‘English Songs of the Georgian Period’: ‘The earliest printed version known to the writer ('Brighton Camp,' circa 1810), also his manuscript copy, circa 1815, are appended.’ Surely no language can be plainer than this, and evidently at the date of writing Mr. Kidson knew of no earlier printed version than ‘circa 1810.’

2. Even admitting that Cahusac's setting of ‘Brighton Camp’ goes back to 1802, the Dublin-printed copy is at least eight years earlier, and thus there is no disputing the fact that the 1794 copy is the earliest printed version yet discovered.

3. No serious student of ‘tuneology’ would dream of accepting Chappell's theory that the song went back to 1758.

4. The Irish song ‘An Spailpin Fanach’ goes back to the year 1780 or 1785, and is still sung. The author is unknown—like so many other ballad writers—but there is ample evidence that the tune was sung to Irish words prior to the year 1790. Thomas Davis, the Young Ireland poet, wrote a new version of the Anglo-Irish song in 1840.

5. Chappell himself ‘tinkered’ the English song, which in its original version betrays all the well-known Irishisms.

6. I am not alone in regarding the tune as Irish. Both Mr. Alfred Moffat and Mr. Henry Davey—the former a Scot and the latter an Englishman—agree with me as to the Irish provenance of the tune, as also does Dr. Ernest Walker. And surely the reprinting of the Dublin setting of 1794 must be regarded as ‘fresh light.’—Yours faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

GERMAN ORGANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF ‘THE MUSICAL TIMES.’

SIR,—May I be allowed a few words of comment on the very interesting letter in your last issue, from Mr. W. Godfrey Seats? I have always understood that German organs were very complete in the matter of mechanical control over the various stops, &c.; in fact, a good deal of modern German music (e.g., Karg-Elert) is unplayable where this is not so. But I want to speak merely of the ‘piston called “Koppel,”’ the like of which Mr. Seats says he has not seen or heard of in this country. In my organ, built about three years ago by Mr. J. H. Compton, of Nottingham, there is a system of Pedal control which seems to be more satisfactory than the one in the German organ. (In a footnote* to one of the articles in the Musical Times a little while ago, by Lieut.-Col. Dixon, the invention was attributed to Mr. F. Heddon Bond, but Mr. Bond got his idea from my organ, which he saw in process of construction. In this connection it may be interesting to say that my 7-stop Pedal organ, including an open 32-ft. and a 16-ft. tuba, is entirely extended from the Great Organ, as advocated by Dr. Froggatt.)

The German ‘Koppel’ piston acts through the keys themselves, coupling to the manual on which most notes are being played. Are the Pedal stops added to, or reduced, to form a suitable bass, or are only the couplers to Pedal affected? Again, in playing a solo on one manual accompanied by chords on another, the Pedal would couple to the manual on which the chords were being played; what would happen during a temporary cessation of the chords by rests, the solo-part continuing meanwhile? Would the Pedal suddenly couple to the Solo manual? One would be glad to have these points cleared up. In cases, too, where one wanted the Pedal coupled to a certain manual before the hands moved to it, the ‘Koppel’ would apparently be no help; one would have to prepare the stops by hand.

In my organ under each manual is a piston labelled ‘Pedal bass.’ If no stops are drawn, and the Pedal controller (as it is called) under the Swell manual is impressed, only the Swell to Pedal coupler comes on. Similarly those under Great and Choir manuals would bring on Great to Pedals and Choir to Pedals respectively, the others going off. If stops are drawn on any manual the controller under that manual brings on the Pedal coupler and a suitable number of stops, and as stops or manual-couplers are added or reduced on the manual so they are on the Pedal. So that if, say, one is playing on Full Great coupled to Full Swell, the ‘Pedal controller to Great’ gives Full Pedal, with Swell to Pedal and Great to Pedal; if one wishes to go to soft Choir organ, a touch of the ‘Pedal controller to Choir’ gives Bourdon and Choir to Pedal, and again touching the one under the Great manual would restore the full combination as before. So the three difficulties referred to above (which may or may not exist in the German organ) are not found with Mr. Compton's system.

It is no more trouble to actuate these controllers than it is to actuate an ordinary combination piston. They are absolutely instantaneous in their action; and in a moment they can be put out of action so that the Pedal stops are independent of the manuals. The Pedal department can therefore be ‘controlled’ or not, at the will of the player. When the controllers are being used the organ (or, at any rate, the Pedal part of it) does, as Mr. Seats says of the German organ—though, it would seem, even more completely—‘think for itself.’

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths :

GEORGE FREDERICK HUNTLEY, Mus. Doc., on August 4, at the residence of his brother-in-law, at Hemel Hempstead, Herts. He was born at Datchet, near Windsor, on May 31, 1859, and was the only son of Mr. G. Huntley, formerly head-master of Datchet School, which he attended until he was thirteen years of age. He then went to St. Mark's School, Windsor, and after being a member of the Datchet Parish Church choir, he became in 1874 a pupil of Sir George Elvey at St. George's Chapel. The following are the Church appointments he held during his career: St. Mary's, Datchet, 1879; St. George's, Campden Hill, London, 1880; St. Andrew's, Astley Place, London, 1890; the Cathedral, Newcastle-on-Tyne (as organist), 1893; St. Peter's, Eaton Square, London, 1895. The latter post he held until his decease. He became Mus. Bac., 1888, and Mus. Doc., 1894 (Trinity College, Cambridge). He held the distinctions A.R.C.M., F.R.C.O., L.R.A.M., and was a professor at the R.A.M., examiner for the R.C.O., conductor of the Church Orchestral Society (1895-1910), musical adviser to the Borough Polytechnic Institute (1911), and deputy-conductor at the meetings of the Madrigal Society (London). An excellent organist, he was even more distinguished as a choir-trainer, the choir boys at St. Peter's being justly considered to rank with the best to be heard in London. He wrote a good deal of church music, besides part-songs, three operettas, and two cantatas. Two of his Services (in E flat and G) were composed for Festivals held in St. Paul's Cathedral. He was a valued helper at the Royal College of Organists. His charming personality greatly endeared him to all with whom he had relations. He had remarkable enthusiasm for all the varied work he undertook, and he was unsurpassed in his exertions to attain a high standard of efficiency. The funeral took place at Hemel Hempstead on August 8, and on the following day a memorial service was held at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, which was attended by a large gathering of relations and friends. The Dean of Rochester officiated. The music included the anthem 'The souls of the righteous' (Elvey). Amongst those present were Sir George Martin, Lady Martin, Mr. Sheriff and Mrs. Cooper, Dr. Alcock, Dr. Cummings, Dr. A. H. Mann, Dr. C. J. Frost, Dr. H. A. H. Harding, Mr. Spencer Curwen, and Mr. Thomas Shindler.

Mr. E. J. BROADFIELD, on August 2. He was born at Manchester in 1831, and spent most of his life in that city. Our Manchester correspondent writes: Mr. Broadfield was early Victorian, coming from the days of hoops and crinolines; friend of John Bright and Milner Gibson; saw Sir Robert Peel in the old House of Commons in 1845; flourished under Palmerston and Russell; heard the French Republic proclaimed in the Place de la Concorde in 1848, and saw the present Kaiser's grandfather start for Berlin during the great war; friend of Whittier, Emerson, Wendell-Holmes, and Longfellow, the Brights, Stanley Jevons, Sir Theodore Martin, Henry Irving, Charles Jefferson, Charles Hallé—a man of many parts. He had a long connection with Manchester's Press, and music with travel were his main recreations. Possessing a natural gift for music and sufficient knowledge of its technique to make him a competent judge, he was in constant attendance at the Hallé Concerts from their inception in 1858, not infrequently in the capacity of professional critic. At Hallé's death he and others did yeoman service in establishing the Hallé Concerts Society, Ltd., and getting Richter here, and up to his death he acted as chairman of the Hallé executive, making his last annual statement on the Society's affairs on June 2 last. For a long period he was a director of the Gentlemen's Concerts and vice-chairman of the governing body of the Royal Manchester College of Music. He never evinced much sympathy with music of the newer modern school, and when a Mozart, Haydn, or Raff Symphony succeeded, say, a Strauss or Delius tone-poem, at its close he would quietly turn in his seat, his face wreathed in smiles, as though to say, 'Now that's music.'

SIEGFRIED JACOBY, violinist, for some time leader of the Hallé Orchestra, on August 17, at Manchester. He was born at Hamburg in 1835, and studied at Leipsic and Paris. He retired from Hallé orchestral work in 1895. Liszt, Berlioz, Joachim, and the brothers Viextemps were his close friends. He played in the orchestra at Leipsic when Berlioz's 'Damnation de Faust' was first produced under such disastrous circumstances, and loved to tell how the players appeared to be the only ones to perceive the greatness of the work and refused any remuneration for their services on that occasion. When Hallé was absent, Jacoby would act as deputy-conductor. Some of the most famous fiddles have passed through his hands en route to wealthy collectors.

DAVID POPPER, one of the most celebrated violoncello players of all time, at Baden, near Vienna, on August 7, in his sixty-eighth year. He was born at Prague on June 18, 1846, and received his early training in the Conservatorium of that city, studying under the famous Goltermann. By the time he was eighteen Popper was an accomplished performer. In the course of a tour made at this period he became acquainted with Von Bulow, who was much impressed with the young player's talent. He was often heard in London at the Monday Popular Concerts and elsewhere. In 1896 he accepted a professorship at the Royal Conservatorium at Buda-Pesth, and the duties of this post forced him to renounce travelling as a performer. In 1872 he married the famous pianist, Sophie Menter. They separated in 1896. Only a few weeks before his death the honorary title of Hofrat was conferred upon him by the Emperor Francis Joseph. Amongst his compositions there are a Requiem for three 'cellos, and a Suite for violoncello and orchestra.

Mr. RICHARD WESTCOTT, who died on August 3, was born at Oundle, Northamptonshire, in 1837. He was educated at Queen Elizabeth's Grammar School, Kingston-on-Thames, and Pembroke College, Cambridge, of which University he was B.A. In his earlier life he was a regular 'first-nighter' at theatres; subsequently he transferred his attention to the opera, and of late years almost entirely to concerts, being one of the few for whom novelties were specially attractive. Although not a trained musician, he acquired considerable critical acumen, and being an excellent linguist, and most painstaking and conscientious, became a valued contributor of foreign notes to the Musical Times, the concluding years of the late Musical World, and for a considerable period to the Monthly Musical Record.

Mr. ARTHUR E. GRIMSHAW, organist of the Catholic Cathedral, Leeds, aged forty-nine. He was found dead on Hawksworth Moors, near Guiseley, on August 1. Born at Leeds, he was appointed organist of St. Anne's R.C. Cathedral in 1883, a position which he occupied till his death. He suffered from insomnia, and left home on July 8. It was only on August 1 that his dead body was found, and at the inquest it appeared that he died from heart failure, owing to over-exertion in walking. He composed much church music, and also two successful operettas, as well as a number of songs. Some of his orchestral music was produced by the Leeds Symphony Society, of which he was conductor. He was also conductor of the Leeds Amateur Operatic Society.

HENRY WALMSLEY-LITTLE, Mus. Doc. at West Norwood, on July 26, in his sixtieth year. He was an active and able musician who had a wide sphere of influence in London. He was Mus. Doc. of Oxon. (1885), and his diplomas, &c., included F.R.A.M., F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L. He was a member of the Council of the Royal College of Organists, of the Council of the Union of Graduates in Music, and of the Corporation and Board of Trinity College of Music. He studied at the Royal Academy of Music from 1872 to 1878. His organ appointments were held in the following order: Christ Church, Woburn Square; St. Matthew's, Denmark Hill; St. Giles-in-the-Fields; and Holy Trinity, Tulse Hill. He composed some useful and agreeable music, both sacred and secular. He was deeply respected by his professional brethren.

MADAME INGEBORG VON BRONSART (née STARK), the well-known pianist and composer, who recently passed away at Munich, aged seventy-three. Born on August 7, 1840, at St. Petersburg, of Swedish parents, she early showed musical gifts, and as a pianist had the privilege of instruction from Adolph Henselt and Liszt. During her sojourn in Paris in 1861 she enjoyed the friendship of such artists as Auber, Rossini, Berlioz, and Wagner (who mentions her good looks in his autobiography). On September 14, 1861, she married the German composer, Hans von Bronsart. She was a prolific and refined composer. Several of her operas have been successfully produced on many German stages.

A. HAMILTON COLLYER, M.A., Mus. Doc., F.R.C.O., L.R.A.M., who died at Dollar, Clackmannan, on June 18. He was director of music in Dollar Institution for twenty-five years, and was well known as a lecturer on music and musicians. He studied under the late Sir Robert Stewart, Dr. Peace, and others, and previous to his appointment to Dollar Institution was organist at Dunblane Cathedral, Forres Parish Church, and South Free Church, Elgin. He was born at Scarborough in 1851.

MR. EDGAR MILLS, on July 19, at Oxford. He was born at Nottingham on October 6, 1851. Early in his life he came under the influence of John Farmer, with whom he identified himself in promoting the Harrow Music School. Later he went to Cologne, and studied under Gernsheim. After his return to England he became organist at Balliol College, Oxford, and since that period he has held many teaching appointments in that city. He was a remarkably successful pianoforte teacher.

Mrs. MAUDE, of Overton, Flintshire, on July 30, at the age of ninety-three. She composed a number of hymns that have been widely used. The one by which she is best known, 'Thine for ever, God of Love,' was written in the Isle of Wight nearly seventy years ago. She married the Rev. Joseph (afterwards Canon) Maude in 1874. Her daughter became the wife of the present Bishop of Liverpool.

Miss KATE BOUNDY, at Abergavenny, on August 7. She was the daughter of Mr. G. L. and the late Mrs. G. L. Boundy, of Exeter. She had considerable musical gifts as a composer, and some of her small pieces have achieved wide popularity. She was a former Student at the Royal College of Music.

MADAME FRICKENHAUS, on August 8, in the sixty-fourth year of her age. In her prime she was considered one of the most distinguished pianists of the day. She played at the Crystal Palace concerts under Sir August Manns, and at the Philharmonic concerts, as well as on the Continent. She introduced Goetz's Pianoforte concerto to England in 1880. Her maiden name was Miss Fanny Evans.

MR. C. W. MURPHY, on June 16, at Bournemouth, aged thirty-eight. He was author and composer of a number of music-hall songs that attained considerable popularity, including 'Kelly from the Isle of Man,' 'Oh, oh, Antonio,' 'We all go the same way home,' &c.

NICOLA ANGELO MANFROCE.

By CLAUDE TREVOR.

I make bold to say there are few musical people who are familiar with or, indeed, have ever heard of the above musician, and yet those in his birth-place, in Calabria, have but recently honoured his memory by placing in one of the public squares at Palmi a marble bust of the youthful composer, and report speaks highly of the work, copied as it has been from a painting in the Library of San Pietro a Maiella. Manuscripts of his repose peacefully among the musical archives of the Naples Conservatoire, undisturbed for many a long day; but dying at the early age of twenty-two (he was born at Palmi on February 20, 1791, and died in Naples on July 9, 1813) his productions appear to have been sufficiently plentiful, and evinced the desire to break with old established rules. Manfroce appeared at a time when the Neapolitan school was at a very low ebb, for since Cimarosa and Paisiello anything in the way of a noteworthy composer was sadly wanting; indeed one may say that any promising pupil of the Naples Conservatoire was entirely stunted by the prohibition of the two chiefs of the establishment—Zingarelli and Tritto—to study or have anything to say to the innovators who were looming on the musical horizon. The subject of this slight sketch raised rather a flutter, coming as he did just between Cimarosa and Rossini, and showing, as has been said, so marked a tendency to strike out a line for himself. Who knows what he might not have achieved had not inexorable death claimed him?

At a very tender age Manfroce revealed decided aptitude for the divine art. When eleven years old we are told that he, along with some musical youngsters of his own age from Palmi, went to Catanzaro where they organized a concert. Knowing nothing of harmony or counterpoint, a year later he wrote and had executed a Mass which called forth great praise. A shop-keeper of Palmi, a certain Gaetano Cresci, volunteered to take him at his own expense to Naples to study seriously, which the boy did under Antonio Bianchi, who in 1804 managed to get him accepted as a pupil of the Conservatorio della Pietà dei Turchini, where he worked with a will under Giovanni Furno and Giacomo Tritto, studying composition under the strict discipline of Zingarelli, who it may be mentioned en passant was Bellini's master. The opinion of a famous authority on the youth's powers is, I think, well worth giving, showing what the musical world lost by his early demise: 'Gifted,' he wrote, 'with every quality necessary for the forming of a great composer, and animated with the spirit of innovation, he appeared destined to produce a revolution in music, so much needed at that period, and joined to these traits we must add the very important one of true poetic feeling.' Among the works of other great writers, he studied with unbounded enthusiasm those of Haydn and Mozart. At fifteen he began seriously to compose, but being still under the thumb, so to speak, of the Conservatoire he was bound to begin with two Masses, a 'Dixit' for four voices and orchestra, and a symphony. Freed at length from scholastic trammels he wrote his first opera, 'Alzira,' which was given at the 'Valle' at Rome in 1810, and reproduced at Naples in 1819. The overture bore strong signs of the influence of Cimarosa. For the San Carlo in the latter city he composed 'Ecuba,' which was brought forward during the Carnival. It is interesting to note that some of the phrases in a quintette and the Finale to the second Act served Rossini for his Finale to the first Act of his 'Barbiere.' Unfortunately an immoderate life sowed the seeds of the disease that was to cut short his brief career. Notwithstanding the rapid strides it made he worked on assiduously at his third and last opera, 'Piramo e Tisbe,' but no record remains of its ever having been represented. The King granted him a pension to enable him to leave Naples to endeavour to re-establish his health, but after a brief stay at Pozzuoli he returned, and died in the former city, mourned and regretted by many.

A MUSICIAN'S SHRINE: AUGUST WILHELMJ.

By D. CHRISTIE TAIT.

There are at this season of the year large numbers of English visitors at Wiesbaden, Homburg, Bad Nauheim, Frankfurt, and many other delightful resorts scattered in or near the Taunus district, and yet it may be safely stated that but an infinitesimal proportion of them will visit, or will even hear of, the charming little old-world town of Usingen, nestling in a picturesque valley among the wooded hills that form such a delight to those whose good fortune it is to spend some time, either as residents or as tourists, in this part of Germany. Even the journey thither is made under primitive conditions, which are a striking contrast to those prevailing on the great main lines which bring one from Great Britain. A little branch line runs from the well-known watering place of Homburg, taking the passenger through the beautiful Lochmühl valley, while the monotonous sound of a bell on the locomotive is the only warning the unwary countryman receives not to wander across the metals as the train approaches.

For those who love the antique, Usingen is a delight in itself, and considerable time may be employed in inspecting the narrow alleys and the quaint old-fashioned houses, plentifully decorated with ancient designs and bearing on the outside walls home-like and useful mottoes, which survived the great fire that destroyed so much of the former beauty and attractiveness of the place at the end of the 17th century. But Usingen was the centre of a tiny principality, and Prince Walrad erected on the ruins a new town, and, partly with the assistance of French Huguenots, inaugurated a period of great prosperity. His memory has since been immortalised in a very tasteful monument that stands in the Castle Park which he himself laid out in accordance with the then famous French ideas.

But the music-lover will not get so far as that without noticing on the left-hand side of the road as he comes from the station a house which, standing alone at the foot of a short street leading straight up to the castle, seems even at the first glance to be marked out from the rest. Over the portal hangs a tablet informing the visitor that in that house August Wilhelmj, the violin-king, was born on September 21, 1845. Inside, in a simple room on the ground-floor, is a 'Wilhelmj Archive,' which for an outlay of 2½d. the visitor is invited to see. There is no need to knock or ring, for the door is unlocked, and as we enter a friendly dog announces to the inmates that someone is there. The room itself is a musician's paradise. A few questions to the old dame who watches over the interests of the museum elicit information as to the early history of one of the greatest violinists of the 19th century. In 1816 the miniature principality of Usingen had been raised by Napoleon to the Duchy of Nassau, and Usingen was the capital. Of those who took service under the Court was Wilhelmj's father, himself an amateur violinist of very considerable ability. The first thing which attracts our attention is a number of school certificates and reports, from which we learn that, like so many others who have later become famous, August Wilhelmj was a duffer with his books. 'Unsatisfactory' we read on nearly every page, or remarks about laziness, neglect, and playfulness. Even in his earliest years he was never far from his violin, and at the age of nine gave his first concert at Wiesbaden. In 1861 he came into contact with the Prince of Wied, who recommended him to Liszt, and from that time onward the future of the young prodigy was assured. All this information may be gathered from various papers and documents that lie on the table of the little museum at Usingen. Among others are thirteen letters from Richard Wagner, the first one, dated from Bayreuth on June 3, 1872, confirming the appointment of Wilhelmj as 'Konzertmeister' of the performance of the 'Ring.' We turn from these fascinating documents to a pile of music, and find several bound volumes, which prove to be a pianoforte score of the 'Ring' with the inscription in Wagner's handwriting on the front page: 'This is my Konzertmeister! His name is August Wilhelmj! Richard Wagner.' On the same table are copies of all Wilhelmj's own compositions and arrangements of other works for the violin, which will assuredly attract every musician, amateur or professional, who is not already acquainted with them.

On the walls are numerous diplomas which Wilhelmj received at various times from musical societies in all parts of the world. Mention need only be made of those from London (presented on his sixtieth birthday), Stockholm, Leyden, Melbourne, Rio de Janeiro, to show that his fame was not confined even to a single continent, but stretched to every corner of the world. Then there are photographs galore, not only of the violinist himself, but also of many of his most famous pupils, the latter often bearing inscriptions that testify to the affection and gratitude which he inspired. Photographs also of Wagner, Frau Cosima Wagner, Liszt, Richter, Mottl, Adeline Patti, Svendsen, to mention only a few, may be seen in different parts of the room; nor must we forget a particularly beautiful one of Queen Elisabeth of Roumania ('Carmen Sylva'), surrounded by many of her own works which she had personally presented to Wilhelmj. Even then the contents of this little treasure-house have not been exhausted, for much time can still be spent looking through the innumerable books of newspaper cuttings (from all parts of the world), programmes, copies of the Musical Times, &c.

There is certainly no country in which more interest should be shown for the famous Usinger than England, where for many years he lived in a Northern suburb of London. Those who had the honour of his acquaintance at that time, those who were (one might say) lifted into another world by his playing at the 'Monday Pops,' or elsewhere, and finally those who were privileged to study under him at the Guildhall School, will certainly never forget it, but there must be many who do not know of the efforts that are being made to perpetuate his memory in the little country town where he was born. If the collection is still a small one that is not due to lack of will but to an insufficiency of funds, so that it may be doubly hoped that every music-lover who travels in these parts will visit the capital of Nassau, now no longer an independent duchy, and they will assuredly find that such expenditure of time and trouble as is necessary to get there will be more than repaid by the interest and fascination of this musical oasis in the desert of commonplace towns and villages.

THE COVENT GARDEN SEASON.

SOME REFLECTIONS BY AN OPERA-GOER.

The Covent Garden season has come to an end, leaving, we believe, a substantial sum to the credit of the Grand Opera Syndicate, and the financial success will no doubt cause a good deal of congratulation and rejoicing. In many ways the year has been most remarkable. Never before has London seen three opera seasons end without a deficit. Never before has it been proved more clearly that there is here a public able to recognise and willing to support good opera at any time of the year. Taken at its full the tide will carry us far—perhaps even to National Opera. If, on the other hand, next year were to find our managers trying to induce the public to accept something less good, the interest will wane and the occasion be lost. Unfortunately, most of the artistic events of the year were entirely due to private initiative. We say 'unfortunately' because a bad failure is sufficient to discourage private effort. No single individual, however enthusiastic, however generous, can afford to fight for long against so many difficulties unless success attend his efforts. The burden clearly remains with those who can count upon unqualified support in high quarters and the prestige that comes with it. To them we ought to look for interest and excellence. Surely if we pay the highest price we have the right to expect the best article, and the prices at Covent Garden are higher than those of any other theatre in Europe. Yet it has to be said that all the peculiarly interesting performances, all the great novelties of the year, were due to the illuminated enthusiasm of an intelligent, well-informed private individual; that while he was introducing new singers who fulfilled with singular ability the many demands of modern music, and new operas illustrating all that is vital in modern music, Covent Garden was contented with a star—Caruso—and with a réchauffé of old operas seasoned by two extraordinary novelties.

Of the old operas some we would like to hear every year. Wagner's 'Ring' is one of those supreme achievements for which the musician and the public at large profess equal affection. Like Beethoven's ninth Symphony, it ought to be given once at least in the year in every city with a claim to musical taste. But it is not enough to produce it. It must be done well. If the work is to retain its hold on the public the performances ought to improve in quality every year. This year, instead, apart from the admirable conducting of Herr Nikisch, the stage arrangements were wholly unsatisfactory. Of the singers engaged a few were very good, most of them were tolerable, some were bad. The only novelty in the production, which had been trumpeted abroad as if it had been a great innovation, was the apparatus for the Rhine daughters—a new toy for good children. The rest of the stage machinery was, as it has always been, deliciously naive. Wotan's daughters were still seen riding their hobby-horses, and a picture of local worthies in congress, with or without calumet, was still meant to represent the Gods awaiting their final doom. Stage machinery, however, is only a secondary consideration. The all-important matter is the music, and in this respect the performances of the 'Ring' showed a falling off from the standard of previous years. To take one instance, the singer who took Siegmund and Siegfried is, neither as a singer nor as an actor, of the class one has a right to expect at Covent Garden. The part of Siegfried, we are aware, is one of the most difficult in existence, and few tenors can stand the test. But when the charge for a stall is what it is at Covent Garden we may surely expect that the leading parts be taken by those who can give a truly representative performance. This may seem unfair to an artist who possesses unquestionably good qualities; but the point is that these qualities are not of high enough rank for London's best and only official Opera.

Another element of weakness was the chorus, and this was as true of the German as of the French and Italian seasons. Is it not astonishing that in England, where choral singing is cultivated to a perfection unknown in any other country, we have to tolerate opera chorus-singing that is in its best moments second-rate, and at its worst simply unworthy any serious stage? At the performance given in honour of M. Saint-Saëns it was positively painful to hear the union choir of Elders falling and falling below pitch. As for histrionic powers nothing more ludicrous can be imagined than, for instance, the action of German noblemen hailing the arrival of Lohengrin. In England these things are well done only by the touring companies who employ English singers. But Covent Garden likes not the tongue of Shakespeare. No matter what language is used—German, French, Italian, or a gibberish which is not one of them—English must not be heard. So great is their dislike for everything English that even when, through previous engagements, Herr Nikisch could not attend the first performance of 'Götterdämmerung,' an inexperienced conductor from abroad was engaged (who had, we were told, never seen the score), rather than give one of our conductors a long-sought-for chance. Why, we would like to ask, this distrust of English musicianship? Is it not a fact that in spite of all discouragement, in spite of a struggle more strenuous, more heartbreaking here than anywhere else, young English musicians have produced, and continue to produce, works which are sure proof of sound musicianship and scholarship, if nothing else? The men of absolute genius can be counted on the fingers of one hand, here and elsewhere, but one need not be a great composer to be a good conductor. All that is essential in a conductor is that he should know the composer's materials, and many of our young musicians have given proof of this. The power to penetrate to the heart of a great work and to convey one's ideas to an orchestra are to some extent inborn, but how are these young people to show what is in them if they are never given the chance to test their mettle?

Of course, all this must end sooner or later. The generation that is springing up now is perfectly conscious of its right and of its worth. It cannot for ever be denied admittance. We have only to think of the orchestra of forty years ago and the orchestra of to-day. But in the meantime there is a great deal of opposition to be overcome, and the Covent Garden authorities have it in their power to smooth the way and so lessen the hardship. We cannot expect them to allow experiments. Covent Garden is not the place for that; yet there is a good deal of well-tryed material which is never by any chance met there. True enough, there were some English singers, but most of them belong to an older order of things. Take Melba for instance. Her voice has unquestionable beauty, but it is most decidedly undramatic. We may call it charming, and pretty; in its way it is perfect, but it never has dramatic expression. How much modern music rests for its effect upon dramatic expression can easily be found out by glancing at the plots of the new operas young Germany and young Italy send us. At one time, as Rossini has said, a singer needed three things—'Voice, voice, and voice.' Nowadays this could be paraphrased into 'Intelligence, intelligence, and intelligence,' and we should get nearer to the truth.

Another danger, which cannot well be avoided so long as the present system continues at Covent Garden, is that, having a limited supply of singers at hand, they must assign to singers rôles which are not in their province. M. Franz made an admirable Samson, and for this very reason he made a poor Julien in 'Louise.' The character of the music is entirely different in the two operas, and whoever succeeds in one cannot succeed in the other. M. Franz made as gallant an attempt as could be wished, but he could not possibly conquer against such unnatural odds. His performance as Julien was a great credit to him. We could see that he knew exactly what ought to be done, although he could not do it. The impression it gave was that of a Falstaff trying to squeeze into his page's clothes. So long as singers are chosen not only on account of their ability but of their nationality as well, this is unavoidable.

We come lastly to the novelties and to the Gluck fable. It is difficult to find any plausible excuse for the conduct of the Covent Garden authorities in regard to novelties. How is it that, after shutting their doors to Strauss, Moussorgsky, and the rest, they open them wide for Von Waltershausen and Camussi? Do they consider 'Oberst Chabert' and 'La Du Barry' more beautiful than 'Rosenkavalier' or 'Boris Godounov'? It would be interesting to know what their method is, and upon whose judgment they rely in the choice of new operas. Whatever plan they have it does not seem to work very well, and the sooner it is changed the better. At one time Covent Garden accepted only what the Continent had time and again pronounced good—obviously the policy of the weak, but infinitely preferable to the policy that caused the inclusion of 'Oberst Chabert' and 'La Du Barry' in this year's programme. As for the Gluck fable it is, we fear, too old to be exciting, but it must be mentioned in a notice resembling a speech for the prosecution. The Covent Garden authorities have always professed the greatest admiration for Gluck, and since time immemorial they have included one of his works in the list of operas which deserve, in their opinion, performance. Their reverence for so eminent a master is of course most creditable, but it has caused a misunderstanding which is possibly not quite cleared yet. It would be really a fair act if the Covent Garden Syndicate were to tell us openly that although they intend to honour Gluck's memory by placing his name on their bills they do not mean to perform his operas.

Mr. David Stephen, director of music to the Carnegie Dunfermline Trust, recently composed a Grand Festal March to commemorate the tenth anniversary of the foundation of that body. The work is scored for full military band. The old Scottish Psalm tune 'Dunfermline' is introduced, there are also suggestions of 'The pipes o' Dundee,' which is the family tune of the Carnegies. The first performance took place on August 9, in the band Kiosk, Pittencrieff Park, Dunfermline, before a large audience.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

QUEEN'S HALL.

The Promenade Concerts, the nineteenth season with the present management, began auspiciously on August 16. A large audience, determined, as usual, to find enjoyment in everything presented, welcomed Sir Henry Wood and his orchestra, which is probably the best that has yet been gathered on such occasions. It is not only that the ensemble playing is often superb, but in every department there are efficient soloists to be brought forward as the music demands. In our last issue we gave an analysis (which has been widely reproduced) of the chief features of the programmes announced for the season. So far all the promises of the prospectus have been fulfilled. The opening concert brought forward Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' a Wagner concert on the 18th excited the usual interest, on the 19th Humperdinck's 'Hansel und Gretel' Overture, Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini' Fantasia, and Liszt's Preludes were the attractions. A novelty was Percy Grainger's characteristic treatment of the 'County Derry' Air and 'Shepherd's Hey.' On the 20th, Bach's second 'Branderburg' Concerto, Debussy's 'L'Après-midi,' Berlioz's 'Queen Mab' Scherzo, and Brahms's C minor Symphony were the chief items. Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture, and Strauss's 'Don Quixote' (the violoncello solo part to which was well played by Mr. C. Warwick-Evans) were attractions on the 21st, but there was even more general interest shown in the appearance of the famous Dr. Ethel Smyth to conduct a performance of her fine dramatic Overture to 'The Wreckers.' The rare spectacle of a lady, and a particularly energetic specimen of her sex, acting in this capacity evidently absorbed attention, and the ability displayed in the music drew enthusiastic approbation. The 22nd was largely a Beethoven night, Mr. Arthur Catterall playing the Violin concerto with great skill. The vocal soloists that so far have appeared include Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Aimée Kemball, Miss Mary Lockhart, Miss Bessie Jones, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Thorpe Bates, Mr. Haigh Jackson, Mr. Lorne Wallet, Mr. George Parker, and Mr. Ivor Foster. Mr. Albert Fransella (flute) and Mr. Sydney Rosenbloom (pianoforte) have also performed.

MR. VIGGO KIHLL.

Mr. Viggo Kihl, who for some years has practised his profession as a pianoforte teacher and performer in London, has accepted an important position as a pianoforte professor at the Toronto Conservatory of Music, of which, as stated in our last issue, Dr. Vogt is now the Principal.

Mr. Kihl was born at Copenhagen on November 11, 1882. He entered the Leipzig Conservatoire in 1898, and remained there for three-and-a-half years. He then returned to Copenhagen and performed frequently at concerts. In 1907 he came to London. He has performed with success at the Æolian, Bechstein, and Steinway Halls, the Royal Albert Hall, and the Crystal Palace, as well as in the provinces. Last year he went on tour with a concert party to South Africa. During recent years he collected foreign news for the Musical Times. He sailed from England on August 16, and will take up his new duties early in September. The friends he has made in London and elsewhere wish him great success in his new sphere of work.

BIRMINGHAM.

Arrangements for the coming local musical season are now completed, the season practically beginning with a fortnight's grand opera at the Prince of Wales Theatre from September 15 to September 27, to be given by Herr Ernst Denhof's specially-organized company. The novelties to be introduced will comprise Richard Strauss's 'Elektra' and 'Rosenkavalier,' also Debussy's 'Pelleas and Melisande.' The repertory will include Mozart's 'Magic flute,' Gluck's 'Orpheus,' Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman,' 'Tristan and Isolde,' and the 'Meistersingers.' The conductors will be Messrs. Thomas Beecham and Schilling-Ziemssen.

The following forecast of the principal coming events is of more than ordinary interest, although one regrets that there will be a dearth of purely orchestral concerts, owing to the discontinuance of the Birmingham Philharmonic Society's series of orchestral concerts on account of the heavy losses sustained by them in previous seasons. There now only remains the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, who, faithful to their Saturday night Popular functions, again provide four concerts, under the direction of Mr. Julian Clifford, of the Harrogate Kursaal Orchestra.

It is gratifying to be able to state that chamber music will once more be under the control of the Birmingham Chamber Concerts Society, the executive being the Catterall String Quartet, as hitherto. The most prominent feature in connection with the four Harrison concerts will be the reappearance of Madame Tétrazini at the first concert, and Herr Arthur Nikisch, with the London Symphony Orchestra, at the last concert. The four Max Mossel drawing-room concerts provide an excellent array of eminent artists, among whom are Miss Irene Scharrer, Miss Adela Verne, Miss Daisy Kennedy, Madame Julia Culp, Madame Lula Meisz-Gmeiner, Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Jean Waterston, Herr Egon Petrie, Herr Louis Schnitzler, and the Vienna Rosé String Quartet.

Choral music will be an important factor, all the local Choral Associations again being well represented. Our premier choral body, the Birmingham Festival Choral Society, conducted by Dr. Sinclair, have issued the following attractive scheme in addition to the customary Yuletide performance of the 'Messiah.' The works to be given are 'Gerontius,' also Elgar's 'We are the Music Makers,' Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' Beethoven's great 'Mass in D,' Goring Thomas's 'The swan and the skylark,' and Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association (conductor, Mr. Joseph H. Adams) propose to give Berlioz's dramatic legend 'The Damnation of Faust,' Coleridge-Taylor's beautiful cantata 'A tale of Old Japan,' the 'Elijah,' and a concert recital of Wallace's opera 'Lily of Killarney.'

The Midland Musical Society, conducted by Mr. A. J. Cotton, will give Elgar's cantata 'The Black Knight,' Bach's motet 'Be not afraid,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' cycle, Berlioz's 'Faust,' Bach's 'St. John' Passion, or Gounod's 'Redemption.'

The Birmingham Choral Union have arranged for performances of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' the 'Messiah,' Edward German's 'Merrie England,' Bach's 'God's time is best,' Handel's 'Dettingen' Te Deum, and Mozart's Symphony in E flat. The conductor is Mr. Richard Wassell.

We are also promised a visit from the Carl Rosa Opera Company, who for the first time will go to the popular Alexandra Theatre. The choice of operas will no doubt be of a popular and attractive character, but the scheme is not yet available. For the first time we are to have a Chappell Ballad Concert, the cast of principals to include Miss Louise Dale and Miss Margaret Cooper. The annual Scottish Concert will be given at the end of November, under the auspices of the Birmingham and Midland Scottish Society.

CAMBRIDGE.

The University Musical Society's programme for next year is an ambitious one. An orchestral concert will be given at the end of the Michaelmas term. This has not been part of the Society's programme in past years. At this concert the Society's orchestra will play Bach's fourth Brandenburg Concerto for solo violin, two flutes, and strings; Beethoven's third Symphony, and Brahms's Violin concerto. On February 12 the choir and orchestra will perform Bach's Mass in B minor, and on June 12 Berlioz's 'Faust.' With such a programme before us, the untiring energy and enthusiasm of our conductor must be met by a like spirit among the members of the choir and orchestra, and, moreover, by a like capacity for work. The chamber concerts need more support. On October 29, a concert will be given by the Rosé Quartet. On November 12, Egon Petri will give a pianoforte recital, and on December 2 Elena Gerhardt will give a vocal recital. In the Lent term we shall hear the London String Quartet on January 21. On February 4, a concert of chamber-music will be given. Music for flute, clarinet, strings, and harp (which will be played by Miss Miriam Timothy) will be performed. On March 4, we shall hear the Brussels Quartet.

The programmes of this series of concerts will be announced on the Society's card, which is printed at the beginning of next term.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

The Wesleyan Methodist Conference, which was held in Plymouth in July, has, through the efforts of Mr. James T. Lightwood, organist of Kingsway Hall, London, for the last three years definitely recognised in its agenda the valuable work done by music chiefly in its own connection and in religious worship generally. A festival of music, mainly of Methodist character, now occupies a permanent place in the programme of the Conference, and it was on July 25 that Mr. David Parkes, organist of Ebenezer Wesleyan Church, assembled a choir of over a hundred voices in the church, who sang anthems, choruses, and solos to a crowded audience. Mr. Stanley Parsonson, organist of Launceston Wesleyan Church, was at the organ, and an excellent address on the history and significance of music in the church was given by the Rev. A. E. Sharpley. The anthems included an early and very tuneful composition of Mr. Parkes, 'What are these?' and an expressive setting by Mr. Lightwood of the hymn 'The radiant sun.' Another piece which commended itself as appropriate to Methodist services was an anthem, 'The King of love,' by Fricker, and other numbers were sung representing Smart, Handel, Bennett, and Mendelssohn.

On August 8 the Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir visited Abergavenny and competed in the Royal National Eisteddfod of Wales. Owing to the large number of entries only one of the set pieces was heard—'The fallen heroes' (Cyril Jenkins), an accompanied piece with many dramatic moments, though without particular merit in part-writing. The sudden harmonic effects produced pitfalls which gave the piece value as a test, and these difficulties were almost invariably surmounted by the choir which was conducted by Mr. David Parkes. Their singing compared favourably with that of other choirs in culture, legato, and control of tone-colouring. By a not exactly fortunate chance in the ballot they were the first choir to be called upon, and considering that their long journey had necessitated a start at 4 a.m., and that many of them had not been able to secure a meal, their performance was highly creditable. The adjudicators were Dr. Walford Davies and Mr. D. Jenkins, and the remarks of the former complimented the Plymouth singers, who, he said, the adjudicators felt had not been able to do themselves justice. (See the Competition Festival Record for a full account of the Eisteddfod.)

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

To the many who have known the value of Dr. Wood's work for thirty-five years in and out of the organ-loft at Exeter Cathedral, his restoration to health and resumption of his duties are extremely welcome events. During the several months of Dr. Wood's absence for travel and rest the deputy-organist, Mr. F. J. Pinn, did excellent service at the Cathedral. Soon after his return (July 28) Dr. Wood visited the little country town of Bampton to 'open' a new organ in the parish church with a well-selected recital programme. The instrument has been built in the east end of the north aisle, and the action is pneumatic. The Diapasons are dignified and massive in tone, and a special feature is the cornopean, which, though placed in the Swell and on ordinary pressure, is of good power, and useful as a solo or chorus reed.

On August 11 a miscellaneous concert at Chudleigh was given by Mr. C. W. McAlister (pianist), supported by an excellent party.

At the Torquay Pavilion the Municipal Orchestra have been augmented to forty players, and the enlarged resources have produced such excellent artistic results that it is hoped the enlargement will be permanent. On August 13 Miss Gertrude Lonsdale brought an exceptionally efficient party of artists, who gave an interesting ballad concert. The special feature was the introduction of several violin pieces and songs composed by Mr. Haydn Wood, who himself played. His music is essentially sincere, and the subject-matter is original. As an interpretative artist as well as a vocalist Miss Lonsdale reached a high standard. The other members of the party were Miss Jennie Taggart, Mr. Geoffrey Seabrook, and Miss Marjorie Wigley (pianist). On the following day the Orchestra performed a Grieg programme, and on August 16 they celebrated their first anniversary with a Symphony (Beethoven, C minor) concert in the afternoon, and a specially-selected popular programme in the evening. The speciality-composer programmes were continued during the following week, the earnestness of purpose of Mr. Basil Hindenberg and his men showing no abatement.

Axe Vale Musical Society gave a stage performance on August 14 and 15 of 'The Yeomen of the Guard,' Mr. W. C. Walton conducting. The chorus and orchestra numbered over sixty performers, and worked very creditably.

Miss Ruby Davy (violinist) was the chief performer in a concert at Buckfastleigh on August 20, organized by Mrs. W. Hamlyn. In addition to solo pieces, she played Trios by Widor and Gade with Mr. Harold Hamblin and Mrs. W. Hamblin.

CORNWALL.

Portions of 'The Messiah' were sung on July 21 by members of the Porthleven Wesleyan Chapel, under the direction of Mr. Alfred Walters, of Camborne, who was at the organ.

On July 27 an organ and violin recital was given in St. Paul's Church, Penzance, by Mr. R. J. Maddern Williams and Mr. E. L. von Weeks, both of Norwich. Pieces by Peace, Wagner, and Mendelssohn (organ), and Contini and Schubert (violin) comprised the programme.

Falmouth Adult Male Choir, conducted by Mr. E. E. Howard, gave a concert on August 3 at Kimberley Park, singing accompanied and unaccompanied part-songs with much success.

Under the conductorship of Mr. F. White, St. Ives Choral Society gave a miscellaneous concert on August 7. On August 11, at Looe, Miss Hilda Saxe (pianist), Miss Aimée Carvel (violin), Miss Winifred Blight (cello), and a glee party gave an attractive concert in aid of a local charity. A similar commendable object drew a large audience at Hembury Fort, Payhembury, on August 13, to hear a concert given by Miss Edith Anderson, Miss Sybil Mitchell, and Messrs. J. C. Rowe and Alfred Brooke. The presence in Newquay and district on holiday of several musical artists was taken advantage of by Mr. Pendarves Trist on August 18 for his annual concert in aid of the lifeboat fund, and the contributors to a varied programme of high merit were Miss V. Sloman, Señor J. S. Gomez (violin), Messrs. Harrison Hill, J. L. Rogers, D. Parkes, and Dr. Norman Salmon.

Mr. Thomas E. Wright has been appointed to succeed Prof. Sanford Terry as conductor of the Aberdeen University Choral and Orchestral Society. The appointment is a popular one. We wish Mr. Wright every success. Prof. Terry has conducted this flourishing Society since 1898. It is a matter of deep regret to all concerned that ill-health has compelled him to retire.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Although at present Manchester is becalmed in the musical doldrums, yet there are occasional puffs of wind sufficient to indicate that before this month is far spent we shall be riding in a pretty stiff gale and sail will have to be trimmed accordingly.

So far as at present arranged the promenade concerts of the Manchester Orchestra, Ltd., will be conducted by Balling, Speelman (two concerts), Bantock (who will pilot the band through an evening of his own compositions), and Hamilton Harty, Verbrugghen, and Arthur Payne, who will each take a concert.

Brand Lane, as usual, maintains a discreet silence respecting his engagements, stimulating curiosity from time to time by a judicious revelation of a big 'scoop,' such as Aekté's coming in November for the finale of Strauss's 'Salome' with Wood conducting, and 'the world's record second highest paid male singer' in the person of Sammarco for another concert. For a full disclosure of the Hallé plans we must wait until next month.

It is reported that in fulfilment of the late Mr. Broadfield's promise of June 2 that new blood should be introduced on the Hallé executive, the names of Messrs. Sidebotham and Grommé had been considered; possibly Mr. Broadfield's death (see Obituary, p. 606) may lead to some modifications. These two gentlemen would only reinforce an already strongly conservative element in the executive.

It is proposed to recognise the services of the late Benjamin St. J. B. Joule by placing a tablet to his memory in the Holy Trinity Church, Hulme, Manchester, in which he was baptized and where he was honorary organist prior to occupying a similar position at the once-famous St. Peter's Church, Mosley Street, Manchester (demolished in recent years for street improvements). As writer, critic, organist, and pioneer in the revival of the choral service in the Church his services merit recognition, for he was one of the first, outside English Cathedrals, to venture upon the choral service at Holy Trinity, Hulme.

In succession to Sir Henry Wood, the Westmorland Festival executive have appointed Balling as conductor of the next Festival in the spring of 1914 at Kendal.

It was Charles Dickens who described Lancaster (the scene of the latest pageant) as a 'pleasant place dropped in the midst of a charming landscape on the line of march to Westmorland and Cumberland, with a fine ancient fragment of a castle; a place of lovely walks and possessed withal of staid old houses and quaint narrow streets.' Here during the first week in August an attempt was made to demonstrate 'the recovery of that sum of qualities which went to make up the "Merrie England" of our forefathers.' Music undoubtedly came under this head. Mr. J. W. Aldous, conductor of the justly-famous Lancaster Choir, rendered conspicuous help in the musical episodes of the pageant. The music he composed or specially arranged for the occasion was very successful and popular.

The last performances of 'Hamlet' in England by Sir J. Forbes Robertson and Miss Gertrude Elliott are to be at Blackpool Opera House on September 8 and 13, and as a generous tribute to the genius of such distinguished actors, the members of the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society, conducted by Mr. Herbert Whittaker, are to sing at the fall of the curtain on Act 4, Berlioz's wonderful setting of the so-called 'Ballad of Ophelia' from the 'Tristia' suite, composed when Berlioz was under the spell of the great art of Henrietta Smithson, the famous Shakespearean actress who visited Paris about 1850 when Shakespeare was all the rage in the French capital. Artistic co-operation such as this is not too common nowadays, and in addition has singular appropriateness on this occasion of farewell.

The syllabus of the seventh session of Dr. Carroll's training class for music teachers, Onward Hall, Manchester, has been issued. The lectures, twenty in number, commence on October 16, and are held once a week. Among the lecturers announced for the session are Miss Marie Brema, Mr. Tobias Matthay, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Isidor Cohn, Mr. Francis Harford, and Dr. Carroll. Copies of the syllabus may be had of the honorary secretary, Mr. George Pritchard, 230, Upper Chorlton Road, Manchester.

ALTONA.

Saint-Saëns's second Symphony and Debussy's choral work 'La demoiselle élue' were performed at concerts conducted by Felix Woysrch. Herr Robert Bignell always gives interesting programmes. Among the works lately heard at his concerts were Max Reger's 'Romantische' suite, Saint-Saëns's third Symphony in C minor, Violin concerto by Theodore Dubois, and Elgar's 'Serenade' for string orchestra. And at his chamber music concerts Max Reger's Violin sonata in F sharp minor, Stenhammar's String quartet in A minor, and the Pianoforte quartet in C minor by Richard Strauss were played. Madame Olga Zeise and Herr Heinrich Kruse performed Hans Pfitzner's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello.

Handel's beautiful and rarely performed oratorio 'Belshazzar' was recently produced under Herr Roetger's direction.

BADEN-BADEN.

Under the auspices of the Städtische Kurverwaltung a concert of unpublished compositions by Haydn was given on July 28. Among the works heard were a Symphony in D major for string orchestra, two flutes, two oboes, and two horns, a Divertimento for six wind instruments, and an Overture and two Arias from the opera 'Orlando Paladino.' The programme also included a Serenade for string orchestra by Ditters von Dittersdorf.

BASEL.

During the latter part of the season a number of chamber music compositions, including Verdi's String quartet in E minor, a new String quartet by H. David, Hans Huber's Sonata 'Quasi Fantasia,' and a Violin sonata by Julius Weismann were heard. Reger's 'Frohnsinn,' and Felix Woysrch's 'Fahrenden Musikanten' were sung at the last concert of the Basler Männerchor.

BERLIN.

Among the new works to be performed by the Deutsches Opernhaus during the coming season are Otto Fiebach's 'Die Herzogin von Marlborough' and 'Die Blinde von Pompeji' by Marziano Perosi.—Bruckner's fifth Symphony in B flat major, Draeske's 'Symphonia Tragica,' a 'Sinfonietta' by Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Heinrich Zoellner's second Symphony, Variations on the chorale 'Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten,' by Georg Schumann, Dvorák's 'Serenade,' the 'Sinfonia Domestica' and the new 'Festliches Praeludium' by Richard Strauss, and Elgar's Overture 'Cockaigne' are among the works to be performed at the coming series of Philharmonic concerts (conductor, Arthur Nikisch).—Along with interesting manuscripts lately sold by Herr Leo Lipmannsohn at an auction held in Berlin were the seven Menuets by Mozart, composed when he was thirteen years of age (L158), Weber's first Pianoforte sonata in C major with the famous 'Perpetuum mobile' (L152), the second bassoon part of Beethoven's Overture, Op. 124, and a number of letters by Gluck, Haydn, Schumann, and Richard Wagner.

BRESLAU.

In connection with the commemoration of the centenary anniversary of the liberation of Prussia, the standing musical feature was the production of Gerhardt Hauptmann's 'Festspiel,' preceded by a 'Königsmarsch' by Richard Strauss composed specially for the occasion.—An early and rarely heard composition by Strauss, a hymn 'An den Friedensfürsten,' for unison choir, orchestra, and organ, a Pianoforte concerto by Graf Bolko von Hochberg, and a 'Festkantate' by Hugo Kaun, were performed at a concert given in celebration of the Emperor's jubilee. Other works lately heard included Enrico Bossi's 'Intermezzi Goldoniani' and the symphonic-poem 'Scheherazade' by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

BRUSSELS.

Among the works to be performed during the coming season at the Théâtre Royale de la Monnaie are Gabriel Fauré's 'Pénélope,' 'Cachaprés' by Casadesus, Charpentier's 'Julien,' Debussy's 'l'Enfant prodigue,' Vincent d'Indy's 'Istar' and 'l'Etranger,' 'Le Timbre d'argent' by Saint-Saëns, Wolf-Ferrari's 'Joyeux de Madone,' Wagner's 'Parsifal,' and Strauss's 'Elektra' and 'Salome.'

BUDA-PEST.

Beethoven's ballet 'Prometheus' was recently given for the first time at the Royal Opera. The original plot, which is lost, was on this occasion replaced with one written by the poet M. Alexander Bródy. On the same occasion Gluck's 'Maïenkönigin' was performed for the first time. A little later Alexander Szeghő's one-act opera 'Bathory Erzsébet,' Debussy's 'l'Enfant prodigue,' and Mozart's Ballet 'Les petits riens' were staged for the first time.

CREFELD.

Under the direction of Prof. Müller-Reuter performances were given of Bruckner's seventh Symphony, Mahler's fourth Symphony, and the 'Passionsoratorium' by Felix Woysrch.—The Liedertafel (conductor, Herr Willy Geyr) performed Heinrich Hofmann's 'Waldfräulein' for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra.

CRACOW.

Leoncavallo's opera 'Zaza' and Massenet's 'Le jongleur de Notre Dame' were recently heard here for the first time.

COPENHAGEN.

Under the direction of Herr Frederik Schnedler-Petersen, Dubois's 'Symphonie Française' was lately performed for the first time.

DRESDEN.

Dr. Max Arend has founded a Gluck Society whose mission is the revival of Gluck performances, and the publication of revised editions of his works.

EISENACH.

The programme of the second 'small' Bach festival which is to take place on September 27 and 28 has now been fixed. At the concert in the St. Georgenkirche a number of rarely heard organ and violin compositions, a Cantata for two solo voices and orchestra, two motets and a number of a cappella choruses by other old masters will be given. A feature of the other chamber music concerts will be performances of Bach's Concerto for four pianofortes and string orchestra, and a Concerto for four violins and string orchestra by Vivaldi.

ELBERFELD.

Among the novelties to be performed during the coming season at the Municipal Theatre are Wagner's 'Parsifal,' 'The girl of the golden West' by Puccini, Wolf-Ferrari's 'Der Schmuck der Madonna,' 'Silvano' by Mascagni, 'Theodor Körner' and 'Stella Maris' by Alfred Kaiser, and Zoellner's 'Der Schützenkönig.'

HAMBURG.

Handel's 'Caeciliënede' was performed at the twentieth concert of the Vereine Hamburgischer Musikfreunde (conductor, Herr Josef Eibenschütz).

KIEL.

Adolphe Adam's opera-comique 'König für einen Tag,' 'Die Regimentstochter' by Donizetti, and Meyerbeer's 'Afrikanerin' were revived at the Municipal Theatre just before the close of the season.

LEIPSIK.

The town council have voted a sum of £3,750 as a special subvention to the 'Parsifal' performances which are to take place at the Municipal Theatre during the coming season.

LIÈGE.

The house where Grétry was born has been acquired by the town, and turned into a Grétry museum, which was recently opened by the King and Queen of Belgium.—At a festival concert of his compositions given under the direction of M. Sylvain Dupuis the programme included excerpts from the operas 'Les deux Aïeules,' 'Zémire et Azor,' and 'Lucile,' and a number of orchestral works.

MILAN.

The new season at the Scala Theatre commences in October next. Among the works to be performed are Verdi's 'Nabucco,' 'Falstaff,' 'Un Ballo in Maschera,' 'Ernani,' and a concert performance of the master's 'Requiem.' Signor Mascagni's new opera 'Parisina,' composed to the libretto of Gabriele d'Annunzio, is to be produced under the composer's direction. The opera 'L'Ombra di San Giovanni,' by Ettore Moschino (libretto by Franco Alfano), Montemezzi's 'L'Amore dei tre Re,' and Wagner's 'Parsifal' are also included in the scheme.—An unpublished Overture to Verdi's 'Aida' was recently found amongst the late master's papers.

MUNICH.

Under the direction of Herr Bruno Walter, Hans Pfitzner's interesting opera 'Der arme Heinrich' was recently given at the Royal Opera.—The annual festival concerts of the Konzertverein, given under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Loewe, are at present proceeding (from August 15 to September 15). The programmes include Beethoven's nine Symphonies, Symphonies in C major and E flat major by Mozart, Schumann's fourth Symphony in D minor, Symphonies by Brahms (C minor and D major) and his Haydn Variations, Tchaikovsky's Symphonie pathétique, Liszt's symphonic-poem 'Tasso,' Symphonies (Nos. 5, 7, and 8) by Bruckner, Max Reger's 'Romantische' suite, and Richard Strauss's 'Don Juan,' 'Tod und Verklärung,' 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and his 'Symphonia domestica.'

OSTEND.

Igor Stravinsky's orchestral Fantasy 'Feu d'artifice' was played for the first time at the first Concert-classique given under the direction of M. Louis Rinskopf on July 11.—A programme of works by Belgian composers was given on July 21. Among the compositions performed were Albert Dupuis's Overture 'Herrmann et Dorothee,' the third Act of 'Edénie,' by Leon Dubois, Overture to Racine's tragedy 'Phèdre,' by Martin Lunsens, excerpts from the opera 'Melusina,' by Wambach, and fragments from Paul Gilson's ballet 'La captive.'

PARIS.

The Grand Prix de Rome for composition has this year been won by a young nineteen-year-old lady, Mlle. Lily Boulanger, with a cantata 'Faust et Hélène' (text by M. E. Adenis).

SCHEVENINGEN.

Joseph Jongen's Violin concerto was played by M. Charles Hermann at the third Symphony concert of the Lamoureux Orchestra.

STUTTGART.

A Festival devoted to music by Swedish composers took place recently with considerable success. During the four days of the Festival a number of orchestral, chamber music, and operatic performances were given. Among the works performed were a String quartet in A minor, the second Pianoforte concerto in D minor, and two big choruses, 'Das Volk in Nifelheim,' by Wilhelm Stenhammar. Emil Sjögren was represented with his Violin sonata in E minor and a number of his best songs. Other interesting features of the Festival were performances of Hugo Alfvén's orchestral composition 'Drama' and his 'Sten Sture' for male choir and orchestra. An 'Élégie Symphonique' for fourteen violoncellos and three double-basses by Anton Andersen proved very attractive. A performance of Hallén's opera, 'Valdemarskatten,' was given at the Royal Opera. Among the assisting artists were the Marteau Quartet, Messrs. Tor Aulin, John Forsell, and Madame Julia Claussen. The famous male choir, 'Orphei Dränger,' consisting of present and former students from the University of Upsala, also greatly contributed to the success of the Festival.

SONDERSHAUSEN.

Under the direction of Prof. Carbach Kurt, Atterberg's second Symphony was produced with much success.

Miscellaneous.

MUSIC AT THE INSTALLATION OF KNIGHTS OF THE ORDER OF THE BATH.

The impressive ceremony of the re-inauguration of King Henry VII.'s Chapel as the Chapel of the most honourable order of the Bath, and the ceremony of the installation of Knights that took place in Westminster Abbey on July 22, derived much of its deep interest from the music with which it was accompanied. After Meyerbeer's 'Schiller March' and Tchaikovsky's 'Marche Solennelle' had been played, Psalm lxxviii, 'Exurgat Deus,' was sung to a Gregorian tone during the first procession. Sir Hubert Parry's Coronation Anthem, 'I was glad when they said unto me,' preceded the first lesson. During the procession to the Chapel, Schubert's Grand March in D was played, and while the ceremony was proceeding Jonathan Battisill's anthem 'Behold, how good and joyful,' with a special addition by Sir Frederick Bridge, C.V.O., was given. Gounod's 'Marche Solennelle' was played on the return to the Choir, and the Te Deum was sung to Sir Charles Stanford's setting in B flat. The hymn 'Let saints on earth in concert sing' was sung to 'Dundee' and, as the final procession began to move, 'For all the saints' was sung to Barnby's tune, and later the 'Imperial March' composed by Sir Edward Elgar, O.M., was performed. Sir Frederick Bridge, C.V.O., conducted, Dr. W. G. Alcock, M.V.O., was the organist, and Mr. Stanley Roper acted as sub-conductor.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The following awards were made at the conclusion of the summer term: The Charles Lucas Prize (composition) to Morfydd Owen (a native of Treforest), Harriet Cohen being commended. The adjudicator was Mr. Adam von Ahn Carse. The Parepa-Rosa Prize (tenors) to Gilbert Robinson (a native of Ringwood), Frederick Shaw being highly commended. The adjudicators were Messrs. John Bardsley, Frederick Ranalow, and Dan Price (chairman). The Swansea Eisteddfod Prize (all voices) to Morfydd Owen, Mina Williams being very highly commended, and Eleanor Evans and Mabel James commended. The adjudicators were the same as for the Parepa-Rosa Prize. The Joseph Maas Prize (tenors) to Frederick Shaw (a native of Hyde, Manchester). The adjudicators were Messrs. A. Gibson, W. H. Thomas, and Ben Davies (chairman). The Walter Macfarren Gold Medals (pianoforte) to Adela Hamaton and Brian Nash; the W. E. Hill & Son's Prize (violin) to Frank Howard; the Dove Prize (for general excellence) to Ethel Bilsland; the Charlotte Walters Prizes (elocution) to Eileen Hunt and Muriel R. Crowley; the Ridley Prentice Prize (for the best teaching by a sub-professor) to Janie Blake; the Julia Leney Prize (harp) to Dorothy M. Davies (of Dursley, Gloucestershire); the Frederick Westlake Prize (pianoforte) to Herbert Haworth; the Hannah Mayer Fitzroy Prize (violin) to Herbert J. Brine; the Lesley Alexander Gift (viola or violoncello) to Philip Sainston; the Alexander Roller Prize (pianoforte) to Katharine Hogg; the Challen & Son Gold Medal (pianoforte) to Katherine Doubleday; the Chappell Pianoforte Prize to Vivian Langrish; the Bonamy Dobree Prize (violoncello) to Margaret Bernard; the Mario Prize (tenors) to Frederick Shaw; the Beare Prize (violin) to Edith Abraham; the Albert Hunt Shakespearean Prize (elocution) to Gertrude Hammond; the Mary Burgess Memorial Gift to Donald Mackenzie; the Manns Memorial Prize to Lilian M. Gaskell; the Oliveria Prescott Prize to Morfydd Owen, Gilbert Bolton, and Herbert Brine; the Annie E. LLoyd Exhibition to Katharine Dyer.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

At the conclusion of the Midsummer term of this College on July 25, the following awards were made by the Director and Board of Professors: Council Exhibitions:—Alice E. Norman (pianoforte), Ethel F. Toms (singing), Marguerite F. Gard (singing), Topsy E. Domela (harp), Mildred M.

Marriott (pianoforte), John H. Luxton (singing), Jessie C. Stewart (violin); the London Musical Society's prize for singing, Thomas G. Walters; Messrs. W. E. Hill & Son's prize of a violin, bow, and case, Elsie M. Dudding (A.R.C.M.). The Whitcombe Portsmouth Scholarship was competed for and awarded to Mabel E. R. Summers (pianoforte).

We regret to hear that the quarterly Musical Antiquary will no longer be issued. It served a useful purpose in recording information of a kind not otherwise available for ordinary readers. We fear that there is not a sufficient public for this class of literature, and this fact has no doubt determined Mr. G. E. P. Arkwright to abandon his generous enterprise. The first number was issued in October, 1909, and the last in July, 1913, the contents of which are as follows: Notes on Leonardo Vinci, by Edward J. Dent; Studies in Byzantine Music, by H. J. W. Tillyard; Handel's 'Song in Eight Parts,' by W. Barclay Squire; Entries relating to Music in the English Patent Rolls of the 15th century, by W. H. Grattan Flood; An English Pupil of Monteverde, by G. E. P. Arkwright; Notes and Queries. Quarterly musical journals have not hitherto been successful. The following list shows this: Quarterly Musical Register, January to April, 1812; Quarterly Musical Magazine, 1818 to 1828; The Meister, 1888 to 1895; The Chord, 1899 to 1900; The Quarterly Musical Review, 1885 to 1888.

Miss Gwynne Kimpton's Orchestral Concerts for Young People are making a step forward. Owing to the great success of the previous series, and to the general interest aroused, it has been found possible to secure the services of well-known artists for the coming season. Miss Fanny Davies will be the soloist on October 11; Mr. Leonard Borwick on November 8; Miss Elsie Hall and Miss D. Ewens on December 6; and Señor Pablo Casals on March 21, 1914. Arrangements are pending with other distinguished artists. The concerts are given on Saturday afternoons. Full particulars of the series can be obtained on application to Miss M. L. Alcock (concert secretary), 109, Earl's Court Road, W.

On September 27, the fourteenth great annual championship brass band fête will be held at the Crystal Palace. The entries are very numerous, forming a record in the history of the Festival. There will be nine sections in which to compete, the chief being the championship contest for the Challenge Trophy value one thousand guineas. The test-piece for the championship section, a tone-poem entitled 'Labour and Love,' has been written by a British composer, Percy E. Fletcher. The contests will proceed during the day, and in the evening a grand massed band concert will be held in the centre transept of the Palace, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Henry Iles, who will also direct the whole Festival.

On June 23 the Hobart (Tasmania) Orpheus Club gave their third subscription concert for this season at the Town Hall before a crowded audience. The Club performed eight concerted numbers, the best efforts being Nichols's 'Lourdes' and Nessler's 'The day's farewell,' both of which gained rapturous applause. Mr. C. Tibbs, Mr. Tudor, and Mrs. Rupert Shobridge sang solos very acceptably. Miss Eva Creece had to repeat her two violin solos, which were both played most artistically. Accompaniments were supplied by Messrs. Percy Henry and Arthur Paton. Mr. P. Planche-Plummer conducted.

The August Holiday Course in the Jaques-Dalcroze system of Eurythmics arranged at the Hellerau College for the convenience of English teachers has proved a success in every way. Thirty-five students attended, for the most part English teachers of music. There were numerous other students from other countries. The London School of Dalcroze Eurythmics will open on September 30, at 23, Store Street, Tottenham Court Road, W.C. There will also be public classes in Birmingham, Reading, and Oxford. Preliminary inquiries may be addressed to Mr. P. B. Ingham, at 120, Bedford Court Mansions, W.C.

A successful performance of 'The Creation' (Haydn) was given in the Wesleyan Church, Leyburn, Yorkshire, on the afternoon of Sunday, July 27. The choir was gathered from various churches in the district. The soloists were Miss Nora Skelton, Mr. W. Barrett, and Mr. W. Bell. Mr. C. L. Naylor was the organist, and Mr. R. H. Adamson conducted.

Messrs. Chappell & Co., in the Canadian Courts, recently obtained an injunction against the issue by Gourlay's Music Store, of Jasper West, of the songs 'Dear heart' (Mattei), 'Willow, tit willow' (Sullivan), and of the 'Merry widow' (Lehar). All copies had to be forfeited, and certain claims had to be paid.

In connection with the Festival of Empire Girls' Choir, presentations have recently been made to the conductor (Mr. S. Filmer Rook) and to the organist and secretary Mr. Granville Humphreys of a canteen of cutlery and a drawing-room clock respectively.

Mr. Raymond Rozé, who is at present taking a short holiday on the Continent preparatory to starting rehearsals for his season at Covent Garden, on November 1, has placed his general business arrangements in the capable hands of Mr. Charles Terry.

In the Fortnightly Review for August, Prof. Franklin Peterson (Melbourne) contributes an excellent article on 'Heine on Music and Musicians.' Quotations from the famous poet's dicta are given in English.

Challen & Son's Gold Medal—presented annually by this firm for piano-forte playing for competition amongst the students of the Royal College of Music—was awarded this year to Miss Nora M. Cordwell.

Richard Strauss has finished a new composition, 'Deutsche Motette,' Op. 62. The work is for four solo voices and 16-part a cappella chorus.

Answers to Correspondents.

C. W. PALMER.—As to the metronome rates and the exact meaning of the words 'Allegro, etc.' in Clementi's 'Gradus ad Parnassum' (Tausig's edition), the time-words may be ignored. All the studies should be practised so slowly that it is possible to detect instantly the smallest variations in tone between the fingers, and at first the mechanical action of each finger should be carefully watched. Afterwards, the speed of those exercises designed to give velocity may be increased to any extent which allows of perfect evenness of tone. It will be found that this perfect evenness of tone in rapid passage-playing is only attainable through constant slow practice, and directly any unevenness is detected, slow practice should be resumed. The ultimate pace of those exercises not designed to give velocity must be determined by a broad interpretation of the conventional meaning of the words you quote. They are hardly susceptible of an exact metronome indication.

DUNDEE.—'Hinunterziehen' indicates a downward portamento. 'Seufzend' means in a sighing, moaning manner. We agree that the use of German words as terms of expression exposes many English students to inconvenience, but the fact has to be faced that German composers prefer to use their own language, often because they can thereby express finer shades of meaning than they can in Italian.

GLOUCESTER.—Yes, we know that Bach occasionally wrote consecutive perfect fifths. He would write some more if he were living now. Do not be analytic with your eye. Judge by listening.

T. G.—It is impossible for us to detail all the faults in your anthems. We should need to devote pages to the dreary task, and probably you would be savage and incredulous.

E. W. S.—We have repeatedly stated the label inside a violin in tens of thousands of cases merely indicates that the instrument is constructed on a certain model.

J. H. OXFORD.—If, as you say, you are an old subscriber, you ought to have seen the recent articles on Scriabine's Harmony.

GEORGE JOHNSON.—A sketch of the life and a portrait of M. Vincent d'Indy were given in our issue for November, 1912.
